UN presence in convoy may have prevented worse tragedy

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN

Tensions appeared to subside along the Lebanon border yesterday, and residents were told last night they did not have to sleep in bomb shelters. Military sources said the army was restoring the situation to normal, but some forces were still on high alert against Hizbullah rocket attacks.

Northern Command was wrapping up its investigation into Sunday's bombing, which killed Brig.-Gen. Erez Gerstein, commander of the IDF's Liaison Unit to Lebanon, two soldiers, and a reporter. The army yesterday declined to speculate why two other bomb clusters set alongside the ill-fated convoy failed to go off. But UN officials said that the presence of a UNIFIL vehicle at the tail end of the convoy may have prevented a far worse tragedy. Timor Goksel, spokesman for UNIFIL, said that a UN vehicle with a company commander of the Indian contingent, a major, was behind the last vehicle of the convoy and the officer witnessed the explosion.

"The vehicle was clearly marked as a UN car," said Goksel. "It appears that the presence of the UN car prevented the other bombs going off."

He also said that 15 minutes after the initial explosion, a three-vehicle SLA convoy rushing to the scene was hit 1,300 meters away by a roadside bomb. That bomb only damaged the last vehicle and caused no injuries. Goksel added that the bombs which failed to go off had been hidden in fake stones. IDF and SLA sappers neutralized them.

Sources in Northern Command totally dismissed the UNIFIL account. One person who was in the last vehicle in the ill-fated convoy confirmed that a UN vehicle did arrive shortly after the explosion, but said it was nowhere near it during the critical time that the other bombs could have been detonated.

Still, the IDF declined to elaborate on why the two other clusters of bombs failed to explode. There were several senior officers in the convoy, including two colonels.

Goksel added that UNIFIL forces had been put on full alert, but they too had lowered it a notch by the end of the day, when it became clear that neither Hizbullah nor the Israelis wished to escalate matters.

Meanwhile, military sources said yesterday that SLA militiamen killed two Hizbullah guerrillas in a clash late Sunday night. The SLA men were on an operation in the western sector of the security zone when they detected the guerrillas near the village of Chihin.

PM warns Hizbullah not to fire more rockets

Says response to further attacks would be 'a thousand times stronger'

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH and DANIELA HARMAN

An escalation of hostilities in Lebanon will only take place if Hizbullah fires more rockets into northern Israel, security sources said yesterday. But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warned that Israel reserves the right to attack Hizbullah whenever and wherever deemed necessary.

Netanyahu, speaking in Kiryat Shmona, said that Israel's message to "Hizbullah, the Lebanese government, and... also to others" is that "Israeli citizens and towns will no longer be targets for Katyusha rocket attacks, and anyone who strikes us will receive a blow that is a thousand times stronger."

He added that Sunday's IAF raids were "a sign of what will happen next time, and I hope there won't be a next time."

Finally, Netanyahu said that along with the show of force, "Israel is continuously making efforts - sometimes publicly and sometimes secretly - to find a way to remove its forces from Lebanon without endangering the northern border."

In response to Netanyahu's comments, Labor put out a statement saying that "the IDF does not need the fiery declarations of Netanyahu to carry out its job firmly and efficiently, as it always did. As in every other area in which he is stuck, Netanyahu thinks he can solve the Lebanon problem via a television performance."

Labor Party leader Ehud Barak, speaking on Channel 2, pledged that if he wins the election, he will get Israel out of Lebanon by next year. "I promise you that - if we create the next government - by June 2000 we will be out of Lebanon, with security assurances, and deep into talks with the Syrians."

Barak further advised the setting up of a multi-party forum, which would work to come up with the best solution to the crisis. "I don't understand why Netanyahu isn't able to gather Ariel Sharon, together with Yossi Sarid, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, Yossi Peled, Yitzhak Mordechai, and myself... this is a complex matter that requires everyone's attention."

US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, currently on a visit to between them," said Foley, adding that the Lebanon monitoring group, established at the close of Operation Grapes of Wrath, is the proper forum for the parties to address the current situation.

"We regret the loss of life as a result of the roadside bombing in southern Lebanon over the weekend. And as I said, we are deeply concerned about the escalation of hostilities in the area," Foley said. "It's in nobody's interest to see this situation, which is dangerous, continue to escalate."

"We believe that Israel has a right to secure borders, but we also believe that it is imperative, and in the imperative interests of all sides, that this cycle of escalation be reversed and that the parties use the Israel-Lebanon monitoring group to address these problems."

Ambassador to the US Zalmay Shoval has asked the administration to call on Lebanon and Syria to "calm down the situation" in southern Lebanon, an embassy official said yesterday.

But the American official said he is unsure the warnings will take hold, saying that "I wouldn't want to predict anything."

In a social gathering Sunday night, Shoval told Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Martin Indyk that "the situation can't go on" as it is, and that Israel considers the recent Hizbullah attacks on the IDF "fairly serious," the embassy official said. The discussion occurred at Indyk's home, where he hosted American ambassadors to North Africa and the Middle East, who traveled to Washington for a three-day annual conference that began yesterday.

A-G asks Supreme Court to reconsider Sheinbein ruling

By DAN IZENBERG

Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein yesterday asked the Supreme Court to reconsider its decision not to extradite Samuel Sheinbein, the Israeli-American wanted on suspicion of murder in the United States.

In his three-page request, Rubinstein wrote that the case deserves to be heard again because of its importance for Israel's relations with other countries and because the Extradition Law, as currently interpreted, could turn Israel into a haven for criminals.

In a split vote last Thursday, the court overturned Jerusalem District Court's ruling that Sheinbein could be extradited even though he is an Israeli citizen. Court President Aharon Barak and Justice Aharon Kedmi backed the lower court, which found that Sheinbein was not closely associated with Israel and could therefore be extradited to the US.

Sheinbein's attorney, David Liba'i, appealed the decision, arguing that the Extradition Law, which bars the extradition of suspects who were Israeli citizens at the time of their alleged crime, does not distinguish between one type of citizen and another. Three of the justices, Theodore Orr, Eliahu Mazza, and Meir Ilan, agreed with Liba'i.

In asking for a new hearing before an expanded panel, Rubinstein reiterated some of the arguments made by Barak in his minority opinion.

Rabbinate to back bill to abolish religious councils

By HAIM SHAPIRO

The chief rabbis yesterday met with representatives of the religious parties and agreed to back a bill to abolish the local religious councils which they hope will be passed during the present Knesset recess, before the coming elections.

The move, intended to prevent Reform and Conservative representatives from participating in the councils, is similar to previous proposals by Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron. Until now, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau has opposed abolishing the religious councils.

In the present system, some of the members of the religious councils are appointed by the municipal council according to its political party representation, and Meretz has named people identified with the Reform and Conservative movements as its representatives.

According to the proposals put forward yesterday, the religious councils would be replaced by an auxiliary body to provide religious services, alongside the local rabbinate.

The move is, in effect, an admission of the failure of the amendment to the Religious Services Law, which was passed little over a month ago by just one vote, specifying that members of the religious councils would have to sign an undertaking to accept the halachic rulings of the chief rabbis and the local chief rabbinate on matters relating to the religious councils.

Following passage of the amendment, the Reform and Conservative representatives indicated that despite their unhappiness about doing so, they would sign such an undertaking. Some influential rabbis, especially those identified with Degel Hatorah, ruled that members of the religious councils should boycott the council meetings so as to avoid sitting together with the Reform and Conservative representatives, even after they had signed the undertakings.

In an announcement, the Chief Rabbinate said that a legal committee, including the legal advisor of the rabbinate and the legal advisors of the interior and religious affairs ministries would draw up the proposed bill. According to the announcement, the backers of the bill hope to see it passed by the Knesset during the present Knesset recess, before the coming elections.

However, Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Center, pointed out that in order to put a bill through the Knesset, it would have to be presented as government legislation, and thus pass the Ministerial Committee on Law. Even if it was passed by this committee, it would then have to pass a first reading, go back to committee and then pass a second and third reading.

"It is shocking to see what extremes they will go to out of their hatred of the Reform and Conservative movements," Regev said.

Regev also said that he intends to appeal to Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein over the announced participation of the legal advisors of the interior and religious affairs ministries in the committee drafting the proposed legislation.

Meimad: Barak to drop anti-haredi slogans

By CALEV BEN-DAVID

After the formation of the One Israel list, Labor Party leader Ehud Barak will change his campaign and drop those slogans attacking yeshivot and the haredim which have been criticized as divisive, according to Rabbi Michael Melchior, chairman of Meimad's executive committee.

Meimad, a dovish, moderate Orthodox group, is expected to officially join together with Labor and David Levy's Geshar party to form the One Israel list later this week.

Rabbi Michael Melchior (Ariel Jerozolimski/Jerusalem Post)

As part of that deal, said Melchior, Barak will change the tone of his campaigns and stop using such slogans as "Money for hospitals, not yeshivot" and "Netanyahu gives in to haredim and extremists."

"The attacks on yeshivot, which Barak's been doing as part of campaign created by people who may know a lot about elections, but not about Israeli society, has not been the right campaign," said Melchior.

"I think that after extensive talks with Meimad, Barak realizes he has to use a different language toward Israeli society. Barak has so much that is positive to offer, and I think he's realized that One Israel has to have a more inclusive message."

"The great danger that the whole center-left is becoming anti-religious," says Melchior. "Instead, what Labor and Meimad will now do is open up a new vision for the future, in a campaign which will be directed by both religious and secular people together."

CIA's secret anti-terrorist weapon: Disruption

By JOHN DIAMOND

WASHINGTON (AP) - US intelligence has conducted successful "disruption" operations against terrorists in as many as 10 countries in the last six months, mostly in the Middle East, according to a senior Clinton administration official.

Frustrated by restrictions on using military force against terrorists, the US is turning to a lower-profile tactic. The CIA calls it "disruption" - working with foreign law-enforcement services to harass terrorists around the world.

Least well known of counter-terrorist weapons, disruption involves using new or long-established clandestine alliances with foreign intelligence and law-enforcement services in the tracking down, breaking up, and knocking over of international terrorist cells.

The key to disruption is that it takes place before terrorists strike, amounting to a preemptive, offensive form of counter-terrorism, said Richard Clarke, President Bill Clinton's counter-terrorism coordinator.

"If we have an opportunity to disrupt a terrorist cell that could potentially threaten us, we do it," Clarke said in a recent interview.

"We are no longer going to wait for the attack. We are going to preempt, we are going to disrupt, and we have done that a very great deal."

Paul Pillar, deputy chief of the CIA's Counter-Terrorist Center, said in a recent speech that disruption focuses on impeding "the recruitment, the cell-building, the moving of men, money, and materiel, and the mere maintaining of a presence in a foreign country."

Disruption has the advantage of utmost secrecy, hiding the hand of the US, and avoiding the cumbersome congressional reporting requirements that go with CIA-directed covert operations.

"If it's something major, a significant development, then Congress is informed," said a US intelligence official.

Disruption of terrorist cells represents the nearly daily business of the CIA's new Global Response Center, a hi-tech command center on the sixth floor of the agency's headquarters in suburban Virginia.

The recent arrest of PKK leader Abdullah Ocalan is one of the rare examples where the disruption tactic gained public notice. US officials say the US provided Turkey with critical information.

Assad, Lahoud discuss Israel-Lebanon tension

Syrian President Hafez Assad phoned Lebanese President Emile Lahoud yesterday to discuss tension in south Lebanon, a spokesman for Assad said. The spokesman said the two "exchanged views on the recent developments in the region and the situation in south Lebanon in light of the Israeli aggressions and threats."

The official Syrian newspaper Tishreen yesterday called on Israel to withdraw from Lebanon to avoid more losses. It said Israel's full withdrawal from the security zone and "engagement in serious peace talks with Syria and Lebanon" would bring it peace and security. Reuters

PM orders aid for North

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu yesterday directed Finance Minister Meir Sheerit and the Israel Lands Administration to facilitate the expansion of communities along the northern confrontation line, in accordance with the decision of the ILA board of directors.

Netanyahu reached his decision following a request from the family of the late Maj. Eitan Balahsan, who was killed last week in southern Lebanon. Family members had sought the prime minister's assistance in realizing Balahsan's wish and enabling the expansion of their community of Ramot Naftali. Jerusalem Post Staff

Councils urged to host northern kids for Purim

Education Ministry Director-General Ben-Zion Delli has urged all heads of regional councils to invite children from the North to celebrate Purim in the safety of their communities. Delli, joined by Adi Eldar, chairman of the Union of Local Authorities in Israel, called on heads in the center of the country to host children and their families from the North for the Purim holiday. President Ezer Weizman will host 400 children from the North for Purim on Wednesday. Beit Hanassi announced last night. Ariel O'Sullivan

Hotels vacancy up in wake of attacks

Hotels and guest accommodations in the North suffered a renewed blow to their business as hundreds of Israelis who had planned to go away for Purim cancelled their reservations. According to Moshe Attiya, director of the Upper Galilee Tourist Council, about 40 percent of those who had reserved rooms cancelled.

In Nahariya and Kiryat Shmona, Egged stopped running local buses, although it is continuing to provide bus service to places elsewhere in the country. Egged spokesman Ron Ratner said the decision to discontinue local service was taken in coordination with the security services. Haim Shapiro

Couple wed despite Katyushas

As the Katyushas fell on Sunday evening, Ran and Abigail Alon decided to transfer their wedding from Kiryat Shmona to Kibbutz Ayelet Hashahar. Ran, a resident of Kiryat Shmona, and his wife Abigail, from Hatzor Haglilit, had their photographs taken in Tiberias when reports from Lebanon began arriving. Immediately following the hupah, which took place in Kiryat Shmona, guests drove to Kibbutz Ayelet Hashahar where the wedding party resumed until midnight. "Today after the incidents, it seems to me we will not live in Kiryat Shmona," the groom said yesterday. Itim

US defense secretary delays visit

US Secretary of Defense William Cohen postponed for one week his planned visit to Israel, defense sources said yesterday. Cohen's one day visit was to have taken place this Thursday. The visit will allow Cohen to get acquainted with newly appointed Defense Minister Moshe Arens. But Cohen is also expected to meet with former defense minister Yitzhak Mordechai. Mordechai and Cohen developed warm and close relations over the past two years and are expected to dine together, said sources close to Mordechai. Ariel O'Sullivan

Druze cemetery given military status

Defense Minister Moshe Arens yesterday approved a recommendation from the Public Council for Commemorating Soldiers to turn the sections of military graves in the Druze villages of Beit Jan and Hurfeish into military cemeteries. This new status means that memorial ceremonies will be held in the cemeteries on Memorial Day for the Fallen of Israel's Wars. Ariel O'Sullivan

Soldiers shoot Palestinian at checkpoint

Soldiers shot and moderately wounded a Palestinian man yesterday when they opened fire on a car with Palestinian license plates near Mevo Horon after the driver "tried to break through an army checkpoint, endangering the lives of soldiers," the IDF spokesman said. The IDF imposed a closure on the territories Saturday. Also yesterday Army Radio reported on a Palestinian prisoner riot in Megiddo military jail. The radio said prisoners rioted for several hours to protest interrogations conducted by prison officials. Three guards were slightly wounded. AP

Palestinian gets life in prison in subway bomb plot

Gazi Ibrahim Mezer, a 25-year-old Palestinian who plotted in 1997 to bomb a busy New York subway train in order to "burn the Jews" and free imprisoned Arab militants was sentenced in New York yesterday to life in prison.

Reading from a rambling statement in federal court, Mezer called himself a victim of Israeli and US oppression. "They said Hitler killed six million, but that's a lie," he said. "If there is justice in the world, the Israeli leaders should be tried as war criminals for genocide." AP

Purim in the shelters

REPORTER'S NOTEBOOK

BY AMELIA SULLIVAN

Kiryat Shmona yesterday morning looked like the Pied Piper had come through and rounded up all the children. There were none in sight.

They could be found playing backgammon underground in the bomb shelters. Kicking a ball against its heavy iron doors. Rolled up in a blanket on a fold down metal cot watching a video. It was Purim in Kiryat Shmona and the children marked another holiday in the bunkers.

"They pulled one over on us," said 11-year-old Shimon. "They promised us a Purim carnival and parade today. And what do we get? We have to spend our day in the bomb shelter."

The fifth grader tossed his soccer ball to his friend near the opening of the bomb shelter where they had ventured. His costume of a Hapoel Haifa soccer player had been tossed aside in his bedroom upstairs. He didn't know where. He didn't care.

Ben, 11, was planning to dress up as a punk rocker and head over to the Kanyon 8 mall where posters around town had promised a Purim carnival, a costume parade and surprises for the kids.

"It's canceled. Everything is canceled," said Ben as he gave a swift kick to his soccer ball right into a cement wall. "The children wait for Purim the whole year and now it's gone, ruined. We can't celebrate Purim next week, can we? And they can't very well dress up in the shelters because in the bomb shelters no one sees you, so what's the point?"

says Miriam Bar, mother of a 13-year-old "witch" and a four-year-old "Batman." Costumes that will never be worn.

"Listen carefully," said Amos Shimon, venturing out to stock up on groceries before residents were ordered back into the shelters. "You notice? There are no caps. These streets should have been filled with parading kids dressed in costumes and shooting cap guns. What's Purim without caps?"

"Missing this holiday is a crime for the children," said Shimon, the local optometrist and father of four. "The worse thing is the kids don't understand that you have to celebrate today. We live in a different mentality up here."

Shimon didn't need to force his kids to stay in the shelter. They felt fear all by themselves. They had even started wetting the bed again, he said.

Four Mothers demonstrate for Lebanon withdrawal

By AMY KLEIN

Red flaming torches lit up the darkening sky as the Four Mothers movement protested near the prime minister's residence yesterday evening to demand a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon.

It was the second demonstration demanding an IDF withdrawal since the announcement that three soldiers and a reporter were killed in Lebanon on Sunday. That day some 40 protesters caused a traffic jam in Tel Aviv, blocking the road in front of the Defense Ministry.

Yesterday, only about two dozen people demonstrated, carrying signs like, "We have no more sons for wars!" and "1,236 dead, for what?"

"We are still here with the same demands, because nothing has changed," said Tsafi Shimoni, a member of the organization, with two sons currently serving in the IDF. "There are solutions, but no one has the guts to make them," she said.

Across the street from the demonstration, half a dozen former Kach activists counter-protested, shouting "destroy Lebanon!" and holding signs that read "You are giving Hizbullah backup for killing us!" and "You desecrate the memory of Brig-Gen. Erez Gerstein [head of the IDF's Liaison Unit to south Lebanon killed on Sunday]!"

"We have to go in and bomb Lebanon like in a real war, the way that America decimates Iraq," said Itamar Ben-Gvir. "These demonstrations led by the Four Mothers demoralize our soldiers," he added.

Tsafi Shimoni, a member of Four Mothers, demonstrates for immediate IDF withdrawal from Lebanon outside the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem last night. (Ariel Jerusalem/Photo The Jerusalem Post)

Ben-Gvir, who was recently arrested and then acquitted of attacking the bodyguards of Palestinian adviser Ahmed Tibi, has never served in the IDF because the IDF wouldn't take him, he said. At the Four Mothers protest, Yael Aviv responded to the demoralization accusation: "Why should I feel bad? I've spoken to my son and his friends, who don't mind what we do. I tell them you do the best you can while we try to get you out of there." She added, "They brainwash the soldiers. The IDF tells them, 'you are protecting the North' and so that's what the soldiers think. Look what happens - Katyushas are falling, the residents are hiding in shelters and the soldiers are in Lebanon. How is that protecting the North?"

Limited choices for the Lebanon quandary

There are still many questions about the attack that killed Brig-Gen. Erez Gerstein and three other Israelis in the car with him in south Lebanon on Sunday.

Did Hizbullah have advance information regarding the convoy, or was this a part of the general pattern of attacks?

How was Hizbullah able to lay large road-side bombs under the noses of the UNIFIL forces that are supposed to be "keeping the peace" in the area?

What was the connection between the attack and the rocket barrages on northern Israel earlier in the morning?

Whatever the answers, the short retaliatory attack is unlikely to change the situation.

The terrorist bases are deliberately well protected against air strikes. Numerous large-scale ground attacks into southern Lebanon, such as Operation Litani, the 1982 war ("Peace for Galilee"), and the 1996 Grapes of Wrath operation all failed to improve the situation, and instead strengthened the guerrillas.

Israel cannot evict the residents of the "security zone" who live near the border, and they, along with the terrain, provide cover for the guerrilla war.

Despite the new and more aggressive strategy which has increased the cost to Hizbullah, the IDF's technological superiority is neutralized in this kind of war.

To overcome these limits, Israel has responded with long-range air and naval bombardment.

This risks escalation with the Syrians, who provide protection for Hizbullah, though neither Israel nor Syria want a direct clash.

If these attacks cause enough pain, particularly to the Lebanese, Hizbullah is forced to accept some limits, as evidenced in the 1996 cease-fire agreements.

Indeed, the restrictions on attacks on civilians have reduced the rocket attacks on the northern settlements.

However, this leaves Hizbullah free to concentrate its attacks on IDF outposts, convoys, and patrols.

A unilateral withdrawal would involve the risk of renewed rocket and terror attacks from southern Lebanon, signal Israeli weakness, and invite much wider warfare.

This policy would only be possible following a heavy and successful Israeli attack, allowing the IDF to withdraw with its head held high.

However, past experience has shown that this course is also risky. If there were simple answers, they would have been tried long ago.

Rabbi Ehud Bandel, president of Israel's Conservative movement, and a new member of the Jerusalem Religious Council, said that his movement will use all of its political influence to oppose such legislation. He noted that the amendment had been passed by only one vote and that it was unlikely that MK Yitzhak Mordechai, leader of the Center Party, would again vote for a proposal intended against the Reform and Conservative movements.

"I believe that Yitzhak Mordechai and his friends have learned their lesson," he said, referring to the difficulties which representatives of the new party faced in their fundraising efforts in the US following Mordechai's vote.

CIA

Typically, a disruption operation begins with a scrap of information - an intercepted cell phone call, word that a known terrorist has crossed into another country, a report from a field surveillance team.

The CIA might provide a cooperative foreign intelligence or law-enforcement service with evidence that could provide the legal pretext for an arrest, such as information that a terrorist cell crossed a border with false papers or illegal arms.

"It's rare that we foil a plot that is advanced enough to be clearly identified as a plot," said a senior intelligence official involved in counter-terrorism. The aim is "making professional life difficult for a terrorist group or cell."

Three victims of Hizbullah roadside bomb laid to rest

Jerusalem Post Staff

Israel Radio reporter Ian Roeh, Chief Warrant Officer Imad Abu Rish, and St-Sgt. Omer Alkabetz, who were killed by a roadside bomb in southern Lebanon on Sunday, were laid to rest yesterday. Brig-Gen. Erez Gerstein, the fourth person killed in the Hizbullah attack, will be buried today at three o'clock at the Kibbutz Reshafim cemetery.

Hundreds of relatives, friends, colleagues and public figures attended the funeral of Roeh, 32, in Moshav Yanuv. Though a civilian, Roeh was buried with full military honors, in recognition of his services to the nation in reporting on military activities in the security zone.

In his eulogy IDF Spokesman Brig-Gen. Oded Ben-Ami said Roeh provided "a picture of the north", and said he would be missed by both the military and the media. Channel 1 reporter Menachem Horowitz said, "There was no chance of dissuading a dedicated journalist like Ian Roeh from going on patrol." MK Shimon Peres recounted the long hours he had spent in Roeh's company, calling him a journalist "who poured out light rather than pain."

Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said it was clear from Roeh's work that he loved the residents of northern Israel, and the nation as a whole. Roeh leaves behind wife Sharon, parents Rafael and Olga, a brother and a sister.

Chief of General Staff Lt-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, former chief of general staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, former deputy chief of general staff Matan Vilnai, and former defense minister Yitzhak Mordechai were some of the IDF top brass, past and present, who attended the funeral of Abu Rish, 34, in the Druse village of Yirka.

Lebanese celebrate, brace for renewed attacks

News agencies

Schools closed and streets were empty in southern Lebanon yesterday as Lebanese braced for renewed fighting between IDF troops and Hizbullah guerrillas.

In Lebanon, there were fears that Israel was about to embark on a bombing campaign, similar to operations in 1993 and 1996 that killed more than 300 Lebanese civilians. The IAF struck guerrilla targets Sunday, some of them far north of the border.

In Marjayoun, the main town in the security zone, the streets were deserted and crossing points between the security zone and the rest of Lebanon were closed — a precaution in times of tension.

Schools in government-controlled villages along the front-line were closed, too. In several villages in the southern Bekaa Valley, residents prepared shelters and moved into ground-floor residences.

Hizbullah sealed off a neighborhood in Baalbek that was bombed Sunday night. A two-meter-wide crater on a road could be seen from a distance.

Residents said an abandoned three-story hotel that once served as a Hizbullah base was destroyed, but there were no casualties.

Some schools were closed in Baalbek, long considered a Hizbullah stronghold. Smaller crowds than usual visited the town market.

Schoolchildren in south Lebanon stayed at home with uneasy parents even though the last active Arab-Israeli front remained quiet after fierce air and artillery assaults overnight.

Hizbullah Secretary-General Sheikh Naim Kassem (AP)

us. We hope we never go through it again," said Ali Sabri, a storekeeper at Majdal Selim village which borders the security zone. UNIFIL was on high alert in case Israel decided to make good on its threat and turn the tension into full-scale war.

"There is nothing unusual but we are staying on alert. We were on maximum alert Sunday," spokesman Timor Goksel said.

Hizbullah celebrated last night its bloodiest attack this year and vowed to carry on fighting.

"This operation is a new victory that will be for sure a major turning point for the resistance and will leave an important impact on the people of the region, especially in Lebanon and Palestine," Hizbullah Secretary-General Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah said in a statement.

Hizbullah said its killing of Brig-Gen. Erez Gerstein and three other Israelis on Sunday did not alter its commitment to a 1996 agreement with Israel against targeting civilians.

"What the Islamic resistance did was part of a legitimate right and a holy duty to defend our land in the context of the April understanding which we upheld and still uphold," Hussein Khalil, political assistant to Hizbullah's general secretary, told Reuters.

"All the threats the enemy is launching will not change the aggressive nature of its occupation or the nature of the resistance and its ability," Hussein told Reuters.

"What was this general and the Israeli soldiers with him doing in Lebanese territory except planning to conduct aggression against our people?" he said.

Hizbullah supporters celebrated into the night after the guerrilla group claimed responsibility for the ambush Sunday.

Convoys of cars, blaring their horns, wound through the Hizbullah stronghold in the southern suburbs of Beirut. Passengers waved the Iranian-backed group's flag and gave "V" for victory signs.

Supporters handed out sweets. Chants of "Allahu Akbar" (God is Great) rang from mosque loudspeakers and there were calls for the public to back Hizbullah's battle with Israel. Members of the party fanned out with glass boxes collecting donations.

Hizbullah's al-Manar Television broadcast the celebrations along with archive footage of its guerrillas in action and old television pictures of Gerstein with his troops in the security zone. The group's al-Nour Radio broadcasted military marches and Islamic songs.

Also yesterday, Richard Roth, the charge d'affaires at the US Embassy met with Defense Minister Moshe Arens to discuss the situation in Lebanon. Roth is filling in for Ambassador Edward Walker, who is out of the country.

"The message is to exercise maximum restraint and similar messages have been relayed to Syria and Lebanon," a US official said.

Netanyahu convened the security cabinet for an emergency session on the situation in Lebanon. The three-hour meeting was reportedly tense, with arguments breaking out among some of the senior ministers as to what the government response to the recent attacks should be.

The ministers said in a statement after the session that they were briefed on the situation and were informed that "the army is poised to continue to fight against terrorist forces in Lebanon."

They also sent condolences to the families of the victims of Sunday's attack. Brig-Gen. Erez Gerstein, Chief Warrant Officer Imad Abu Rish, Staff-Sgt. Omer Alkabetz, and Israel Radio correspondent Ian Roeh.

Netanyahu said Israel will only pull out troops if the Lebanese government disarms Hizbullah and deploys its soldiers along the border. If we don't act, the situation will be much worse. We will strike at the Hizbullah with great force and, I am able to say, increasing force, if that is what is needed."

Netanyahu added that the air force carried out an unusually harsh attack and he thought that Hizbullah had received the message. "Our policy [Sunday] is not a one-time act but based on a cabinet decision, and that policy will continue."

Meanwhile, Likud MK Uzi Landau, chairman of the Knesset

Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, said that "we should abandon the rules of the game under the Grapes of Wrath understandings, under which we say we are prepared now and again for Kiryat Shmuna to be hit or IDF soldiers to be hurt and we won't exact a price for it. If we continue like this, the terror attacks will increase in the future to even more than they were in the past."

He repeated his stand that Israel should attack Syrian targets in Lebanon, and also called for heavy attacks on Lebanese infrastructure.

Labor MK Yossi Beilin, who heads a pro-withdrawal movement, rejected Landau's ideas as "an invitation to a nightmare... If Landau is calling for an escalation to Lebanese and Syrian targets, it means that the residents of the North are entering a nightmare from this moment. If that's what he wants for them, I praise his honesty in saying it."

On the other hand, there is a proposal to get out of Lebanon either through negotiations with the Syrians or, if that doesn't work, through withdrawal.

Hizbullah's second-in-command, Sheikh Naim Kassem, yesterday promised more attacks against Israeli forces and the South Lebanon Army, and refused to say what the guerrillas would do if Israel expanded the conflict.

"We deal according to the facts and results, not based on statements," he told reporters in south Beirut.

Hizbullah sealed off a neighborhood in the eastern city of Baalbek that was bombed by Israeli jets Sunday night. A 2-meter wide crater on a road could be seen from a distance.

Residents said an abandoned three-story hotel that once served as a Hizbullah base was destroyed, but there were no casualties. Kassem acknowledged that one Hizbullah base in Baalbek had been hit.

Arens moves up, others stay put

The internal Likud tribunal reviewing the complaints of several candidates who felt they had been placed unfairly low on the Likud list after the party elections last month has found in favor of Defense Minister Moshe Arens, but ruled against five other complainants. The five, including former MK Yossi Ahimeir, are now considering appealing to the Tel Aviv District Court. Ahimeir said last night.

The Likud internal court changed Arens's position from the 26th slot to the 16th. The change was made in accordance to a previous decision by the Likud's election committee under which the second to 16th slots inclusive would be for those running on the national list, and only after that slot would the positions for different sectors and regions come. Arens competed on the national list and came in the 16th position according to the number of votes, but for some reason the position went to MK Avraham Herschson as the first of the regional/sectoral candidates and Arens was placed 26th.

Porat, Hendel may join Tekuma

National Religious Party MKs Zvi Hendel and Hanan Porat are to decide by the end of the week whether to leave the party and join Tekuma, the religious settlers' party.

Porat "wants to leave politics, but will stay if I go with him [to Tekuma]. I am considering this, and will decide after Purim," Hendel said last night. Hendel said the idea of making changes to the NRP list was "unrealistic and pathetic." A week ago, the NRP central committee elected Hendel to the seventh slot, while Porat was pushed from his current No. 5 to an unrealistic 11th slot.

The outcry from Porat supporters led party leader Education Minister Yitzhak Levy to try to get the top six candidates to forward a proposal to make changes to the list. A survey has found that if Hendel and Porat leave the party, it could cost the party some seats.

Solving politics with levitation

Israel can make peace with its neighbors, heal its internal rifts, and have healthier and more intelligent citizens if it adopts the "technology" the Natural Law Party outlined yesterday at a press conference in Tel Aviv.

"We are presenting a real plan for peace that has worked in other places and will work here," party chairman Reuven Zelinkovsky said.

The party, which operates in more than 80 other countries, advocates tapping into the intelligence found in nature to achieve positive results in the political arena and in society, explained Dr. Reinhard Borowitz, secretary-general of the Maharishi International Council of Natural Law Parties.

"Conflicts, such as here in the Middle East, arise when collective consciousness is weak, turbulent, and disorderly," Zelinkovsky said. "The source of the problem lies deeper than race, religion, politics, or terrorist groups. Only relief from stress in society can resolve the problem."

Bezeq phone rates to drop in April

By JUDY SIEGEL

Bezeq rates will drop on April 1 by an average of 8.17 percent, and an additional 2.14% on January 1, 2000.

This was decided last night by Communications Minister Limor Livnat and Finance Minister Meir Sheetrit after adopting recommendations made by the Granau Committee dealing with Bezeq.

The two ministries will soon present a proposal to the Knesset Finance Committee with a detailed list of rate changes.

The committee, headed by Hebrew University economics Prof. Reuven Granau, called for an overhaul of Bezeq rates that would lead to the opening of domestic telecommunications infrastructure to competition.

Under the new plan, some charges will decrease by as much as 30%, while others will rise. Communications Ministry Director-General Daniel Rosenne said last night that rates for services involving "a lot of movement" would drop more, meaning the more one uses them, the cheaper they will be.

Bi-monthly service fees will increase somewhat (except for the elderly and poor people who make few calls), while charges for phone units would drop, encouraging increased use.

This would also make Internet use from home significantly cheaper, and Bezeq will probably offer special "bundling" or flat rates for local calls made to Internet service providers.

The ministries' final calculations will take the inflation rate into effect.

In addition, Bezeq will have to increase efficiency in 1999 by 6% and in 2000 by another 7%.

Defendants in Gaza trial deny link to Hamas

Military judges in Gaza City heard eyewitness testimony yesterday in the case of three alleged members of Hamas's military wing charged with killing Imad Judeh, a Preventive Security Agent, last month in Rafah. The three, Raed Attar, Mohammed Abu Shmaleh, and Osama Abu Taher, allegedly killed Judeh when they opened fire at Preventive Security agents trying to arrest them, and then ran over and killed a six-year-old girl. Media access to the trial was limited, but according to a Palestinian source briefed on the proceedings, the three defendants denied any link to Hamas. Hamas leaders have also denied that the three are members of the organization. The trial is scheduled to resume tomorrow. Jerusalem Post Staff

Hamas prisoners end hunger strike

Forty-four Hamas supporters imprisoned in the Palestinian Authority's Juneid Prison in Nablus called off a 36-day hunger strike late Sunday, according to Ismail Abu Shanab, a Hamas leader. Abu Shanab said the prisoners had reached an "oral agreement" with the PA that 35 of them would be released in the coming weeks. But he voiced skepticism whether this would actually take place. "We've had many promises before and nothing happened," Abu Shanab said. The prisoners have been detained for more than a year without being charged, he said. Ben Lynefield

Buses to offer cheaper fares

The Transportation Ministry announced yesterday it has arranged for the sale of discount tickets on inter-urban buses, so as to encourage the use of public transport. According to the arrangement, travelers can buy a six-trip ticket for the price of five rides on all bus lines on which a ticket costs up to NIS 17.30, including the 405 and 480 between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv and the 400 between Jerusalem and Bnei Brak.

Youth and senior citizens will be able to buy the ticket for half-price. National Insurance beneficiaries will be able to buy the tickets at a discount of one third. On the 400 route, there will also be two-ride tickets for a 20 percent discount, with additional discounts for youth, seniors and National Insurance beneficiaries. Haim Shapiro

Youth gets 6 months in apartment trashing

A Jerusalem District Court judge yesterday sentenced a haredi minor to six months in jail, 12 months suspended, and a year under the supervision of a probation officer for his role in the ransacking of an apartment occupied by Christian women in Jerusalem's Mea She'arim neighborhood. The incident occurred last November. The 17-year-old youth, whose name was not disclosed, took books seized at the apartment and brought them to his father. The books later disappeared. Last week, 28-year-old Yehoshua Weiss was sentenced to eight months in prison and 4 months suspended for his role in the same incident. Dan Izenberg

Dangerous toys confiscated

Some 16,000 dangerous toys were confiscated by Jerusalem police and Ministry of Industry and Trade workers over the last few days, police spokesman Shmuel Ben Ruby said yesterday. They confiscated toys from merchants and store owners. In one incident, they stopped a car and found thousands of exploding toys. In a raid in east Jerusalem by drug investigators, thousands of exploding toys were discovered. The dangerous toys were confiscated and the merchants will stand trial. Amy Klein

By BEN LYNEFIELD

The Palestinian Authority yesterday rejected Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's invitation to hold talks on partial implementation of the Wye accord, saying it would accept nothing less than further Israeli troop redeployments as specified in the pact.

"The basis for us, as Palestinians, as [PA chairman Yasser] Arafat has said, is land and withdrawal from the land," Saeb Erekat, the top PA negotiator, said in an interview with the Voice of Palestine.

"Netanyahu is most welcome if he wants to implement the agreements including the redeployments, but if he wants to use us as an electoral card, then we will not be a party to that," Erekat said.

Erekat added that in addition to two as yet unimplemented troop pullouts specified in the Wye Memorandum, the Palestinian side expects the government to "free political prisoners, give permission for the Gaza port, and activate safe passages" for travel between the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

While the Palestinians charge that Israel froze the agreement in February in order to avoid making further territorial concessions, the government's position is that PA non-compliance with the agreement is what stopped the redeployment process.

Among the Israeli allegations are that the PA is not confiscating illegal weapons, not cracking down on Islamic Jihad and Hamas, and not curbing anti-Israel incitement.

Last week, Martin Indyk, the US Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs credited the PA with stepping up efforts to combat the "terrorist infrastructure" in its areas.

But he said it needs to improve its performance in confiscating illegal weapons and stopping incitement.

He also said Israel has failed to inaugurate safe passage routes, open the Gaza port, and conclude economic negotiations.

Netanyahu, during a visit to Amman Sunday for talks with King Abdullah II, offered what he termed a "realistic and fair" suggestion to break the impasse:

"Have the Palestinians complete all or part of the Wye accords, and we will either, in the case of full compliance, do our part, which is to hand over the additional 5 percent [of West Bank land] or we can find other areas of cooperating and implementation short of complete implementation."

David Bar-Ilan, director of communications for the prime minister, said that what the Palestinians would receive in exchange for complying to Israel's satisfaction on individual issues could be worked out in negotiations.

But Erekat said the entire proposal is an election ploy. "Mr. Netanyahu proposed what he proposed in Amman in order to say to the Israeli center, 'I am for peace and desire implementation', but the Palestinian side refuses [to accept this]," Erekat said.

Conservatives advance conversion petition to High Court

By DAN IZENBERG

The Conservative movement will go ahead with a petition to the High Court of Justice calling for state recognition of its right to convert, even though one of two adopted children involved in its petition underwent Orthodox conversion last week. Conservative movement leader Ehud Bendel said yesterday.

The mother of the boy said her son was converted at the special conversion court headed by Rabbi Haim Druckman.

The court was established by the Neeman Committee to facilitate the conversion of adopted children, because regular rabbinical courts were making conversions difficult by insisting that the parents lead an Orthodox life and send their children to Orthodox schools.

Of the 12 families included in the original petition, 11 have now dropped out.

However, the remaining family will not back down, said Bendel. "Anyone who thinks last week's conversion gets rid of the problem is kidding himself," said Bendel.

"The conversion only proves that what really drives the Chief Rabbinate is not the safeguarding of religious law but the preservation of its monopoly," Bendel said.

"For six years they did not want to convert the boy, saying the mother was not observant enough. Now they've converted him without any conditions or demands."

Hedva Almog, the chairwoman of Na'amat, which helped the mother cope with the conversion difficulties and eventually introduced her to the Conservative movement, said: "There is no doubt that all of the families who petitioned the High Court of Justice and later dropped out, managed to have their children converted by the Rabbinate only because of the threat of the High Court hanging over it."

Last week, after seven postponements, a panel of five High Court judges began hearing the petition, submitted by the Conservative movement and Na'amat.

During the hearing, Supreme Court President Aharon Barak asked the sides to consider a compromise whereby the children's nationality would be listed as Jewish, while the religious classification in the population register, would be left blank.

The court has not set a date for the next hearing.

Hollander recommends reprimand of Bushinsky for political statements

By LIAT COLLINS

Civil Service Commissioner Shmuel Hollander has reportedly recommended that Aviv Bushinsky, the prime minister's spokesman, be reprimanded for making statements of a political nature despite his position as a senior civil servant.

Hollander recommended the reprimand be recorded in Bushinsky's personal file.

However, Hollander did not release any of the alleged statements or find evidence that he arranged entrance for an audience when the prime minister appeared on a television talk show.

Bushinsky's assistant, Ophir Akunis, did however receive a warning for dealing with the invitations to the "Politika" talk show. Several opposition MKs filed complaints against Bushinsky after the show descended into a confrontation between Likud and Labor supporters in which Labor leader Ehud Barak was severely heckled.

Bushinsky said in response that he was surprised that the Commissioner's Office leaked the recommendations and stressed that they were only recommendations and that the legal adviser in the Prime Minister's Office had asked that they be clarified.

In a letter sent by the legal advisor, Shimon Stein, to the Civil Service Commissioner's Office, Stein said that in order for the recommendations to be carried out, it is necessary to point out what disciplinary infringement is involved.

Stein noted that Yigal Hayut, who is in charge of discipline in the civil service, had noted that "in the circumstances in which they were made," he does not consider Bushinsky's statements to be participation in public electioneering.

Stein also said it was not clear what infraction Akunis is guilty of because forwarding the lists of participants at a media event attended by the prime minister falls into the job description of the spokesman and his aides.

Eda Haredit, NCC issue appeal to consult doctors

By JUDY SIEGEL

In an unusual cooperative effort between the anti-Zionist Eda Haredit and the National Council for the Child (NCC), a joint appeal was issued yesterday calling on Eda followers to consult with physicians about sick children rather than leaving their care to complementary medicine treatments.

The statement was issued by Rabbi Yehoshua Scheinberger, chairman of Ra'fa (Medicine According to Halacha), and Dr. Yitzhak Kadman, director of the NCC.

The cooperation was triggered by the recent death of a seven-year-old Sefed boy - the son of a haredi divorcee who immigrated a few years ago from the US.

Initially, police suspected she had beaten or burned the child, but after investigation, they realized the lesions were pressure sores from lying in bed - sick from pneumonia - for a long period.

The mother insisted that her homeopathic treatments could save her son, but he died for want of antibiotics.

The woman had claimed that according to Jewish law, patients require no doctors but only religious faith.

However, Scheinberger and Kadman said that Halacha not only permits seeking professional medical care, but also mandates it.

"Parents are bound legally, morally, and religiously to protect their children's lives and health," they said.

The two added that there is no reason to oppose the use of complementary medicine techniques, but they "must not come instead of conventional medicine, but only to supplement accepted and authoritative medical care."

They added that "asking a rabbi, saying prayers, and making requests [to God] are important, but observant Jews still must consult physicians."

All rabbinical arbiters and sages, they concluded, state that Halacha requires sick people to turn to authorized practitioners of conventional medicine.

Scheinberger said that he and Kadman expect to join forces on other issues regarding the health and safety of haredi adults and children.

He also said that his organization, which follows consult regarding medical treatment and disease prevention, has posted notices warning parents against allowing their children to smoke on Purim.

This is a widespread practice in the haredi community, he said, and many boys get "hooked" on tobacco from their Purim introduction to cigarettes.

Ministry blocking funds for non-profit organizations

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN

Some 300 non-profit organizations, including the Masorti (Conservative) Movement, Na'amat, Tolerance, and Melitz, are currently unable to receive Absorption Ministry funding because the Interior Ministry has refused to grant them approval, citing "administrative problems" in these groups.

However, representatives of some of the organizations claimed yesterday that they never received any notice of a problem, while others insisted that the Interior Ministry never got back to them when they tried to clear up what the problem was.

According to Amiram Bogot, registrar of non-profit organizations in the Interior Ministry, the law requires that these groups file certain documents with the ministry, including financial reports and proof that members of their boards of directors are not paid. In addition, non-profit organizations are required to pay an annual fee of NIS 1,100.

Bogot said the organizations in question had failed to comply with one or more of these requests. "We even sent them letters explaining what was wrong or what they had failed to do," Bogot said. "Some of them fixed what was wrong and some did not."

However, Avraham Infeld, president of the Melitz Centers for Jewish/Zionist Education, said he knows nothing about the problem, although his organization had already suffered from delays caused by the earlier investigation by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein's office into possible double funding of non-profit organizations.

A spokesman for the Masorti Movement also expressed surprise at the report, saying the organization's legal department is not aware of having received any notice from the Interior Ministry indicating any problem. A Na'amat spokeswoman also knew of no such notice.

Ilana Singer of Tolerance, a non-partisan movement against violence, wrote Absorption Ministry officials complaining that although a representative of the group dropped off all the necessary documents on February 10, her group was not included on the approved list.

She claimed that repeated attempts to speak to officials from the registrar's office were turned down, with a clerk saying the matter "is being taken care of."

Among those organizations on the Interior Ministry list of those "missing documents" are: Machon Lev; Elem; Gesher; the Israel Forum; several Habad groups; Meital; and the Gesher theater.

"Letters were sent out to all the organizations based on the addresses we have," Bogot insisted, adding that the organizations still have time to address the problem. He also noted that the Interior Ministry is still checking the operations of the organizations which supplied all the necessary documents, to check on what is done with the money received. "So even those who presented all the documents may not get funding in the end," he said.

Asked what would happen to organizations still waiting for the funding, Bogot said: "It's a very good thing that the government does not fund organizations which are not run according to the law. Either one of two things will happen: The organizations will be run legally and be funded, or they will continue to not be run in strict accordance with the law, and the government will not fund them."

Absorption Ministry officials responded angrily to the report, saying it "takes a very grave view of the fact that the registrar of non-profit organizations in the Interior Ministry has seen fit to examine the organizations at such a late stage, when they should have received funding in January." The spokesman

The ministry spokesman also complained about the overall slow pace of the inspection, and said the ministry had asked for an extension from the registrar to prevent a situation in which existing organizations which do significant work on behalf of immigrants would not even come up for consideration.

The spokesman explained that a solution has been worked out with Rubinstein regarding the previous funding problem, according to which organizations dealing in formal education will be funded by the Education Ministry, and those dealing in informal education by the Absorption Ministry. The Treasury must still approve this formula.

As for the current problem, the spokesman said in a statement: "We will not be a party to a situation in which bureaucratic foot-dragging hurts organizations and thereby impacts on immigrants who receive their services. We believe a deliberate campaign has been launched to destroy the voluntary organizations' activities in Israel. When it comes to absorption, we will not be a party to it, and just like we reached an agreement with the attorney-general, the Interior Ministry will have to adapt itself to the reality in which organizations do such important work."

Dressed up as Queen Esther, members of the International Coalition for Agunot protest outside the offices of the Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem yesterday.

Women demand rabbinate help agunot

By AMY KLEIN

Wearing Queen Esther crowns and chains, dozens of women demonstrated yesterday in front of the Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem to urge rabbis to help what they called the continuing plight of women who could not obtain a divorce from their husbands.

"The rabbis have no courage, they have no halachic heart," said Sharon Shenav, the director of the International Jewish Women's Human Rights Watch, which documents, researches, and publicizes the circumstances of agunot.

"We stood here five-and-a-half years ago and presented our recommendations to the rabbinate. Just last week they said they accepted the idea in principle, but that's the same thing they said back then," said Shenav.

The five principles that the International Coalition for Agunot (ICAR) recommends including the institution of pre-nuptial agreements as part of the ketuba (marriage agreement), imposing a get (rabbinical divorce) on recalcitrant husbands; marriage annulments; an automatic get after 30 days; and a provisional divorce, which Jewish soldiers had in the past deposited with rabbinic courts, so that their wives would not remain agunot if they went missing in action.

Some 60 women - and a handful of men - participated in the demonstration, including Meretz MK Naomi Chazan, Jerusalem city councilwoman Anat Hoffman, and Hadassah International president Marlene Post.

"I will keep bothering them - every week, not every month," said Bella Freund, number 3 in the new Women's Party, which lists religious discrimination as one of its 11 campaign platforms, primarily aimed at financial equality for women.

"Queen Esther fasted to help the situation, and we have to work with the [religious court] judges to remind them of the plight of women," she said.

"I have gone through so much that I am beyond suffering, beyond pain," said a 34-year-old Orthodox woman who asked to remain anonymous lest her husband discover her whereabouts. A battered wife since her marriage in 1993, she has been trying to obtain a divorce for more than four years.

"I would never have believed that Jewish law would allow this to happen, as if I didn't matter, as if I weren't a human being," she said, admitting that she has considered becoming less religious because of the ordeal. "If the judges would feel for a millisecond the suffering we go through, they would behave differently."

Ramat Hovav waste dump sued

By LIAT COLLINS

The Ramat Hovav hazardous waste dump is the object of a class action suit filed in Beersheba District Court against Environmental Services Ltd., which runs the site. The reason: being a deadly danger to public health.

The Environment Ministry, Minister Rafael Eitan and the Ramat Hovav Industrial Site Local Council were also named. It was signed by the Ramat Negev Regional Council and its head, Shmuel Rifman, who is running for Knesset on the Negev Party list. The Association of Southern Scientists; and several individuals.

In the petition, the plaintiffs write that they are concerned the dangers at the Negev site "are some of the greatest to human lives and the public's health in peacetime and are not granted sufficient attention by the defendants." They said immediate court intervention is required to help remove the threats.

They demanded that the court order the site closed until the problems have been fixed; to stop transport of additional hazardous materials to the site in the meantime; and order the appointment of a professional team to run the site and ensure it operates in accordance with business licensing laws.

The plaintiffs are represented by lawyer and former MK Moshe Shalhav who has taken up the case free of charge.

One of the main considerations against closing the site appears to be the fact that there is no alternative hazardous waste dump in the country and there is a danger that large amounts of toxic waste could accumulate, untreated, at source or be illegally dumped elsewhere.

A spokesman for the Ramat Hovav Industrial Site Local Council said council head David Milgrom had used his authority to place a closure order on the toxic waste dump but had rescinded it after receiving a detailed work plan which would amend the deficiencies in accordance with the business licensing laws, the council's demands and those of the Environment Ministry which approved the plan including its funding.

The new director of Environmental Services Ltd., Eitan Zilber, has promised to present the council with a weekly report to ensure the work plan is carried out according to schedule.

40% of non-profit groups religious, haredi

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN

More than 40 percent of all non-profit organizations are either religious or haredi, according to a study by Prof. Benny Gidron of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev's Israel Center for Third Sector Studies.

According to Gidron's study, the "third sector" - the first two being the business and public sectors - spent NIS 33 billion, or 13% of the gross domestic product, in 1995.

"These figures show Israel's third sector to be, relatively, one of the largest in the world," Gidron said. Israel ranks fourth after Holland, Ireland, and Belgium, but ahead of the US and Great Britain, according to a Hopkins Project study done with 35 other countries, administered by Johns Hopkins University in the US.

Some 27,000 non-profit organizations were registered in Israel at the end of 1998, 23% related to religion, 18% education, 13% culture and leisure, and 12% involved in welfare activities.

A conference on the third sector will be sponsored by Gidron's center next week at the Dead Sea Hyatt Hotel.

Polish Catholic indicted for instigating Auschwitz cross dispute

WARSAW (AP) - Prosecutors in southern Poland filed an indictment yesterday against a conservative Catholic activist who rallied others to erect crosses just outside the former Nazi death camp at Auschwitz.

The indictment filed in the Oswiecim local court charges Kazimierz Switon with inciting hate against Jews and with insulting Jews and Germans. If convicted, the charges carry a maximum sentence of three years.

Reached on his mobile phone at the site where dozens of crosses have been erected, Switon called the charges "absurd." "I only said the truth and will prove it in the court," he said.

Prosecutors cited leaflets distributed by Switon in his campaign to prevent authorities from removing an 8-meter papal cross that has stood at the site in commemoration of Polish resistors executed there by the Nazis.

The leaflets include a statement issued on June 28 that urged residents to erect crosses at the site, saying "the time has come for us, Poles, to wage merciless war on Jewish-communist-masonry, the biggest enemies of the Polish state."

The leaflets described Israel and Germany as "satanic-pagan forces aiming at extermination of the Polish nation," according to PAP news agency.

Prosecutors have begun investigating the statements on the leaflets in October after receiving complaints from residents.

Switon launched his campaign last summer to prevent removal of the large wooden cross, used in a 1988 papal Mass, inspiring other conservative Catholics to erect dozens of smaller crosses in protest.

Jews have long objected to the presence of the larger cross, which is visible inside the camp, as an insult to the memory of Jews killed at Auschwitz. Jewish organizations around the world renewed their outrage after the smaller crosses began appearing, and the Israeli government urged Poland to solve the dispute.

Efforts at a solution were set back when a regional court in Oswiecim rejected a request by the Polish government to evict Switon and his followers, who have been camping at the site, and to appoint a government trustee with authority over the area.

The government has appealed. Switon said he would continue to live in a tent at the site until Pope Paul John II comments on the crosses.

Neuberger testifies about Sara

Sara Netanyahu leaves Ramat Gan Family Court yesterday, after her ex-husband Doron Neuberger testified in the case she filed to prevent him from publicizing tape recordings of her and letters she wrote to him during their marriage. The hearing, which is to continue on Thursday, was held behind closed doors.

Husband gets Pessah, wife gets Purim in NY custody battle

By MARILYN HENRY

NEW YORK - A bitter two-year custody battle between New York City's most powerful Jewish families, the Perelmans and the Duffs, ended yesterday with a private settlement. The CEO of Revlon, said Duff baked leavened cookies and had an Easter-egg hunt while Caleigh was with her last Pessah. He also said Duff, a fund-raiser for the Democratic Party, and her beau, New Jersey Democratic Sen. Robert Torricelli, spent Yom Kippur last year at a baseball playoff game.

about leading a Jewish way of life." Perelman's attorney told Justice Eileen Bransten in a battle over Caleigh Perelman, who is 4.

Perelman, the CEO of Revlon, said Duff baked leavened cookies and had an Easter-egg hunt while Caleigh was with her last Pessah. He also said Duff, a fund-raiser for the Democratic Party, and her beau, New Jersey Democratic Sen. Robert Torricelli, spent Yom Kippur last year at a baseball playoff game.

Duff's lawyer fumed: "This is the most offensive micromanagement of Judaism I've ever seen. No one should be allowed to sit in judgment to determine how Jewish you are," according to press accounts.

Duff, once Episcopalian, converted to Judaism before marrying Perelman in 1995. They agreed Duff would raise Caleigh as a Jew. Earlier this month, Perelman asked the court to order that Caleigh spend the holidays with him, because Duff could not be trusted to observe Jewish tradition.

Duff reportedly said in a sworn affidavit that she attended a private seder in 1997 at the home of Rabbi Arthur Schneier of Manhattan's Park East Synagogue. However, a letter from Schneier apparently said congregational seders were held in the synagogue, not his home.

Bransten on Friday ordered Duff to send Caleigh to Perelman for Pessah, but Duff has her for Purim.

Absinthe, immortalized in Degas' painting, is now being marketed to the upscale, artsy crowd of London's Soho district.

Absinthe makes the heart grow fonder

Once banned, the drink is now making a comeback

By MARJORIE MILLER

Degas immortalized it in his bleary-eyed painting, "Absinthe." And Van Gogh nursed a disturbed mind on the aquamarine liquor, which might have encouraged him to amputate his ear.

The "green fairy" to some, the devil's potion to others, absinthe was the drink of choice for a generation of bohemian artists and writers in "fin-de-siècle" Paris until it was banned by the French government in 1915.

Now absinthe is back, this time in end-of-millennium London.

Four entrepreneurs who call themselves Green Bohemia began importing Hill's Absinthe from the Czech Republic two months ago, peddling it primarily to the upscale, artsy crowd of London's Soho district but also offering the elixir for sale only on the Internet.

"A lot of people have gone for it," said Tom Hodgkinson, one of those responsible for the absinthe revival after its absence for decades.

"It is literary and hedonistic at the same time. It appeals to serious drinkers, thinkers and artists."

Oscar Wilde, living in France after his fall from grace in England, was among those who succumbed to its charms before his early death in 1900.

"Absinthe has a wonderful color, green. A glass of absinthe is as poetical as anything in the world," he wrote. "What difference is there between a glass of absinthe and a sunset?" The side effects, for one.

ABSINTHE is about 70 percent alcohol and packs twice the wallop of a shot of vodka. It is made from the wormwood plant, which is reputed to have a hallucinogenic effect, and flavored with a blend of anise, angelica root and other aromatics.

"I haven't heard of anyone hallucinating, but I have seen a few people walk into mirrors," said Paul Hutchison, head bartender at London's The Groucho Club. "Like with any alcohol, people quite often lose part of the evening." Absinthe was first produced for sale in 1797 by Henri-

Louis Pernod, who reportedly bought the recipe from a compatriot living in Switzerland. For more than a century, absinthe flowed in French cafes and cabarets like "the green waters of summer," as the poet Baudelaire described it.

Bewitching color aside, artists in 19th-century Paris drank absinthe because they could afford it.

Absinthe offered a cheap, ethereal drink until it was outlawed in what Hodgkinson called "a moral panic about its effects on the working classes."

Absinthe did not catch on to the same degree and was never banned in Britain, as it was in the United States and many other nations.

But today, the British working classes are not at great risk, with Hill's Absinthe selling for $68 a bottle.

The nonprofit Alcohol Concern, which is what it says, does not foresee an absinthe epidemic but warns against abuse.

"This is an extremely powerful drink and people will want to be very wary about using it," said Lee Lixenberg, a spokesman for the Alcohol Concern.

"Bearing in mind that we don't imagine hoards queuing up to buy this drink, what concerns us most is it is available on the Internet."

Green Bohemia, newcomers to the booze business, wanted to start small and trendy, taking their cues from the marketing success of Absolut Vodka.

Only one of the four partners had any experience with imports. But the quartet had friends in the right places — bars such as the private The Groucho Club, where absinthe was introduced into the media, publishing and theater crowd.

They presented absinthe as "the spirit of freedom," a kind of rebellion against the clean-cut "New Labor" values of Britain's ruling party.

"We despise the bungee-jumping men's health culture that prevails, the world of the Pepsi Max generation, who consider that any activity (no matter how mindless) is better than sitting around doing nothing," Hodgkinson wrote in the Daily Telegraph at the time.

"Absinthe, we think, encourages conversation, independent thought and creativity." The quartet's approach worked. Absinthe attracted media coverage and quick converts, including a film critic who frequents The Groucho Club.

"What do I think of it? I don't think too much because I don't remember. I love it," he said laughing.

Perhaps what he meant was — absinthe makes the heart grow fonder.

Miranda warnings under increasing fire

By LYLE DENNISTON

Miranda warnings seem to have become a permanent fixture in America not only in daily police life but also in television and movie dramas. But that is not the way Antonin Scalia and Paul Cassell would have it, and they just might get their way.

For years, Scalia, a Supreme Court justice, and Cassell, a University of Utah law professor and a one-time law clerk to Scalia on a lower court, have worked — not in tandem, but in common purpose — to challenge the Miranda decision and its famous mandate to police.

The warnings, required before police may question a suspect they hold, are designed to prevent forced confessions. The words are familiar: "You have a right to remain silent." "You have a right to an attorney." "Anything you say can and will be used against you." The 1966 decision in Miranda v. Arizona has so much history behind it that the warnings sometimes seem invulnerable to attacks from critics such as Scalia and Cassell. But that perception is based in the main on two supposed truisms.

The first is that no one is serious anymore about changing the ruling, which withstood an assault by Scalia when he was a top-level Justice Department official in the Reagan administration. The second is that seven consecutive presidential administrations helped make it permanent by willingly accepting it.

Both are simply untrue. In reality, Miranda is under siege again, and may be more vulnerable to change than at any time in its 33-year history.

If Miranda warnings are changed or cast aside, Miranda's supporters are convinced, police will return to trickery in interrogation, and perhaps to strong-arm tactics. The decision's critics maintain that the guilty will continue to get off on technicalities if the warnings are not relaxed.

No one can predict whether a majority of five Supreme Court justices stands ready to overrule Miranda, although in recent years the court has significantly narrowed the decision's scope. And the day might be coming when the court would cut back so sharply on the warnings mandate that police would no longer issue the warnings.

The court might soon have to rethink Miranda, to decide directly whether it is rooted in the Constitution — and thus can be undone only by overruling it or by amending the Constitution.

If the court decides that Miranda has no constitutional basis, federal agents would be bound by what's known as "Section 3501," a 1968 federal law that is far more permissive about police interrogation practices. State and local police no longer would be bound by Miranda. Freed of the legal risk of losing cases because of Miranda violations, officers might give up the procedure. From Miranda's beginning in 1966, it has applied to police at all levels.

THIS MONTH, the 4th US Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia, began setting the stage for an ultimate test of the Supreme Court's willingness to stand by Miranda. The appeals court concluded that Miranda has been displaced by Section 3501.

Scalia and Cassell can take some credit for this new and serious threat to Miranda. Scalia publicly has been advocating a confrontation over Miranda for seven years, and the Circuit Court relied heavily on his views; Cassell has been pursuing that confrontation nearly twice as long, and he argued the case in Richmond.

Cassell says he and Scalia never have talked directly about their views on Miranda, but they have denounced the decision in the same terms: They say it has led to the freeing of many suspects who were guilty of crimes, but who got off because of Miranda.

Section 3501 was passed as one of a series of bold efforts by Congress to counter the liberalism of the court when it was led by Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Congress decreed that if a suspect being held by police for a federal crime had confessed voluntarily, the confession could be used as evidence even if the police had given no Miranda warnings. What had to happen to set up a confrontation over the constitutionality of that section and over the fate of Miranda was a test case for the courts — one like the case unfolding in the federal appeals court in Richmond involving Charles Thomas Dickerson of Maryland, accused of a string of bank robberies.

The Dickerson case seems an ideal test: His Miranda rights were violated, but the confession he gave was found to be voluntary anyway.

If the Miranda decision were followed, his confession would be barred as evidence; Section 3501 would allow it. The appeals court said it must be allowed, because of Section 3501.

The Clinton administration is wedded firmly to Miranda, and hostile to Section 3501. Several lower-level prosecutors in the administration have used Section 3501 to try to get courts to accept voluntary confessions despite without proper warnings, only to be overruled by superiors.

THIS MONTH, Attorney General Janet Reno made the administration position firmer still.

The Miranda decision, she told reporters, is based on the Constitution, and "this administration and other administrations preceding it, of both parties," have agreed that only the Supreme Court can change it.

In 1992, Cassell joined the law faculty at the University of Utah, pressing his legal crusade against Miranda and in favor of Section 3501. He began an alliance with the Washington Legal Foundation, a conservative legal advocacy group, that has led to a series of courtroom assaults on Miranda — including the successful challenge they have made in the appeals court in Richmond.

While Cassell remained an activist on the issue, Section 3501 was getting lost again in the Justice Department bureaucracy.

However, in 1992, Scalia took up the cause. It was the last year of the Bush administration, and John Roberts Jr., a deputy US solicitor general, was appearing before the Supreme Court in a criminal case involving a voluntary confession.

Scalia confronted Roberts:

"I've been listening to Miranda cases... for seven terms now. Why has the United States never cited in any of these cases Section 3501? Is there some reason?... It's clearly very relevant to this case." Roberts said he did not know why, prompting Scalia to ask: "Is this sort of executive nullification of a congressional statute?" Roberts said he could not explain why the justices had never been asked to rule on it.

It was a refrain to which Scalia would return. After the Clinton administration came into office, not much more than a year passed before Scalia was pressing the issue anew.

In a military court martial case, Scalia said to a Justice Department lawyer: "The government just comes in time after time and doesn't take any position on raising 3501, continues to argue Miranda as though there's no statute explicitly addressing it... It seems to me the government ought to have a position on this."

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor also expressed an interest in Section 3501 in that case.

Cassell had played a role in stirring their interest. He submitted a friend-of-court brief in the case for the Washington Legal Foundation. The brief argued fervently that the 1968 law trumped the Miranda decision.

The decision in that case came out in June 1994, but the court took no position on Section 3501 and its effect on Miranda.

O'Connor wrote the opinion, saying questions about that conflict were not before the court. However, Scalia wrote a separate opinion lambasting several administrations for passing over Section 3501.

The court should not continue to ignore Section 3501 and Miranda, he said.

Once again, Cassell and the Washington Legal Foundation have found the appeals court in Richmond most receptive.

When the Justice Department refused before that court to defend Section 3501 to save Dickerson's confession as evidence, the court invited the foundation, with Cassell as the lead lawyer, to do so, and they did, winning their most significant victory. (The Baltimore Sun)

Spending spree already under way for US presidential election in 2000

By CECI CONNOLLY

The 2000 US presidential race is developing into a mammoth spending spree, with Vice President Al Gore aiming to raise a record $55 million and two other candidates considering giving up federal money so they can spend unlimited sums.

Gore, who has been holding a series of private dinners with top fund-raisers, plans to exploit every available legal loophole to collect far more money than the basic spending limits allow. An intimidating war chest, his strategist assert, will scare off other Democrats and give him an early start on attacking the ultimate GOP nominee.

At the same time, advisers to two Republicans — Texas Gov. George W. Bush and Malcolm S. "Steve" Forbes — say they are weighing whether to opt out of the system that gives primary candidates partial federal funding. That would let them spend as much as they want in pursuit of the nomination.

"It's totally out of control," said Stan Huckabee, a Republican accountant who has advised numerous presidential campaigns.

The money chase is so overwhelming that former California governor Pete Wilson (R) and Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., announced last week they would not run. On Thursday, the quest for cash quickens with three candidates — Gore, former vice president Dan Quayle and Democrat Bill Bradley — holding major fund-raising dinners.

"Everybody is pressing the envelope, spending a lot of time worrying about money," said Quayle campaign chairman Kyle McSlarrow.

Twenty-five years after Congress passed a law to restrain the flow of money into presidential campaigns — and two years after a campaign widely condemned for its financial abuses — the candidates are preparing to open the floodgates to an unprecedented amount of unregulated spending.

After investigations by Congress, the Justice Department and the Federal Election Commission into 1996 fund-raising practices fizzled — and campaign reform legislation failed last year — the strategists for 2000 have concluded that there is little risk in pushing the fund-raising boundaries to new extremes.

When the 1974 act was written, lawmakers thought they had devised a foolproof way to shift the emphasis from dialing for dollars back to discussing the issues. They offered candidates a tantalizing deal: five within strict overall and state-by-state spending rules in exchange for millions in taxpayer-provided "matching funds." Each party's nominee would also receive full public financing for the general election campaign.

But a combination of factors coalesced to frustrate those intentions. The cost of campaigning has skyrocketed while the maximum donation has remained at $1,000 for individuals — meaning candidates have to spend more time than ever courting donors.

The entrance of wealthy, self-financed candidates such as Forbes has other potential candidates worrying about how to compete against someone not constrained by spending limits. And a compressed primary calendar that will likely produce nominees by early March 2000 further increases the pressure on candidates to build up their bank accounts now.

"To be competitive, you have to have the money up front," said Howard Opinsky, a spokesman for Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

THE COMPETITION for dollars has become so intense that most candidates will spend half of 1999 trolling for cash, their strategists said.

McCain plans to attend 25 fund-raisers by the end of March, while former Reagan administration official Gary Bauer is busy mining a direct mail list of 90,000 supporters. House Budget Committee Chairman John R. Kasich, R-Ohio, made a pilgrimage to New York to woo mega fund-raiser George Mosbacher, while Elizabeth Hanford Dole is contacting many friends in her husband's ready-made donor network.

Even as Bush prepares to announce the formation of his exploratory committee, a debate rages inside his inner circle about whether he should give up federal funding to attempt to match the wealthy Forbes dollar-for-dollar.

His spokeswoman, Karen Hughes, said only: "A decision has not been made yet." Another top Bush adviser outlined "significant advantages" to forgoing matching funds, but said a final decision would likely come a number of months into the campaign.

In the 1996 primaries, Forbes spent $32 million of his own money, dropping about $4 million in the low caucuses alone, more than double the legal spending limit. His early advertising blitz set off a chain reaction that left the eventual GOP nominee, Bob Dole, with little money and plenty of scars.

"You need to be in a position to respond" to a Forbes attack, said the Bush adviser. Opting out of the federal system "puts you on more even ground with Forbes and his wallet." But the decision is not easy. By one Bush adviser's estimate, the governor would need to raise an additional $17 million if he chooses not to take matching funds. And he would still be limited to raising a maximum of $1,000 from individuals.

"You begin to ask yourself how many people you can find to give you $1,000 each," said one Republican strategist.

Indeed, while other candidates have considered not participating in the matching-fund system, none has taken that plunge without a large personal checkbook to finance his campaign.

In the past, you heard Ronald Reagan's and Bill Clinton's folks make noise about not taking the matching funds," said Anthony Corrado, a campaign finance expert at Colby College. "But, when push came to shove, they all took the money." Whichever strategy Bush adopts, Ron Kaufman, a veteran GOP operative who served in the Bush White House, said much of the former president's financial network is poised to step into action for the son. Already, Bush has played host to more than 75 prominent contributors at the governor's mansion, and his aides boast that between the governor and his brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), the Bush team has a list of 122,000 possible donors.

Gore offers a case study in how to stay within the system of federal funding but stretch the legal limits to the extreme.

Over the years, politicians — with the approval of regulators at the FEC — have invented ways to raise money above the strict federal caps, estimated to be $33.5 million this year. They can collect more by designating some of it as intended for fund-raising costs or legal and accounting expenses. Thus, Gore's target is $21.4 million above the basic spending ceiling.

While the extra cash is supposed to be used for those "exempt" expenses and not on direct campaigning, past campaigns have found creative ways to use the money. For example, the former director of Gore's political action committee, Nick Baldick, is on the payroll of Gore 2000 as a fund-raiser, meaning that his salary can be paid from those extra "exempt" dollars even though he has no experience raising money.

Gore's advisers believe that raising $55 million serves a dual benefit, dissuading potential Democratic rivals from challenging him for the nomination and giving him a financial advantage heading into the general election.

The strategy is "shut-out politics," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, which promotes the tightening of campaign finance laws. "The goal is to shut out opponents." If Gore wins the nomination with minimal effort and can hoard most of his money, he will enjoy a huge strategic advantage over the GOP nominee, just as President Clinton did four years ago. In April 1996, the president's $19 million bank account, allowing Clinton to dominate the airwaves for four months. If the Gore plan works, he, too, will have several million dollars squirreled away for the early summer campaign before the two major-party candidates receive millions in general election financing.

Building on the successful fund-raising model of 1995, Gore has left nothing to chance. Five weeks after opening his campaign, Gore's first solicitation was mailed to 850,000 people, said campaign manager Craig Smith.

The Gore team, like many others, relies on a network of "collectors" to round up donors. Anyone who collects $50,000 from other supporters joins the vice president's national finance board, a ceremonial group that entitles members to attend a handful of private get-togethers with Gore.

Fund-raising for a presidential campaign is as much a grass-roots organizing effort as it is a finance effort, said Smith. "You can have somebody worth a billion dollars, but at the end of the day you can only write a check for $1,000."

Obasanjo faces vote-rigging claims after Nigeria election victory

ABUJA (Reuters) — Nigerian President-elect Olusegun Obasanjo yesterday faced a fresh challenge from his defeated rival Olu Falae, who refused to accept the result of weekend elections marred by reports of rigging.

Falae's allegations were strengthened by former US President Jimmy Carter's statement that irregularities had been so serious he would not be able to judge the outcome of the election.

"Constitutionally and legally and politically we will fight it every inch of the way," Falae told Reuters Television.

Falae received 11.1 million votes compared to 18.7 million for Obasanjo in the Saturday ballot to end a 15-year stretch of military rule in Africa's most populous nation.

Obasanjo, 61, is due to take office on May 29, when General Abdulsalam Abubakar has pledged to step down, less than a year after the sudden death of dictator Sani Abacha opened the door to Nigeria's latest attempt at democracy.

"The stage has been set for the enthronement of a genuine democratic order in Nigeria," said electoral commission chairman Ephraim Akpata, who proclaimed Obasanjo the winner despite Falae's bid to stop the result being announced.

Acknowledging some irregularities, Obasanjo said he believed his opponents would accept the result and "join hands with all of us because at this point in time that is what we need." Foreign acceptance of the election is vital for Nigeria, hoping finally to cast off its image as a pariah and needing outside funding to cushion the blow of a collapse in oil prices.

"There was a wide disparity between the number of voters observed at the polling stations and the final result that has been reported from several states," said Carter, who jointly led a high-powered American delegation.

"Regrettably, therefore it is not possible for us to make an accurate judgement about the outcome of the presidential election," he said in a message delivered after he left Abuja.

The US welcomed the election but said reports of cheating should be investigated. South Africa applauded Nigeria's return to democracy.

Reports of malpractices came from Falae's stronghold in the southwest as well as Obasanjo's powerbase in the north, south-east and Niger River delta.

Nigeria's past attempts to establish democracy have been characterized by massive poll-rigging, as more than 200 ethnic groups sought a place near the center. Soldiers used the confusion to keep power for all but 10 years since independence from Britain in 1960.

An attempt to restore democracy in 1993 only plunged Nigeria into deeper crisis when the army annulled elections that tycoon

Moshood Abiola was about to win, leaving Abacha to seize power in the ensuing chaos.

Abiola died in detention one month after Abacha.

Like Abiola, both Falae, 60, and Obasanjo are ethnic Yorubas from southwestern Nigeria.

The election marks a shift of power to the largely Christian and Animist south from the Hausa-speaking Moslem north which has dominated political life in the country of 108 million people for decades.

Specific policies did not play an important part in campaigning, with both Obasanjo and Falae promising to revitalize Nigeria after corrupt and incompetent military rule which has left most Nigerians in poverty.

WORLD in brief

French, Italian firms sign $540m. deal with Iran

TEHERAN (AP) — Elf Aquitaine of France and Agip of Italy yesterday signed a $540 million energy deal with Iran to boost oil production despite US sanctions.

The deal with the state-run National Iranian Oil Co. for the Dorood oil and gas field is expected to increase Iran's output capacity, the European consortium said in a statement.

Iran's now produces nearly 4 million barrels of oil a day. The Dorood deal is expected to boost that amount by more than 100,000 barrels daily.

The US has strongly discouraged such investment in a nation it describes as a sponsor of terrorism. Congress has passed the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, threatening to punish companies investing more than $20 million in Iran or $40 million in Libya.

Argentina's Menem says this term is his last

BUENOS AIRES (Reuters) — Argentina's President Carlos Menem said yesterday he would not serve as president again, apparently ending frenzied speculation he would seek a third term at the end of 1999.

"This is my last term," Menem told reporters after formally opening Congress. "I am not going to stay on."

Argentine presidents are prohibited from serving three consecutive terms. Menem was elected in 1989 and reelected in 1995, but he has been fighting behind the scenes to alter the constitution for another presidential bid.

But Menem said the constitution would not be modified during his last months in office, saying that "not everyone is in favor."

OAU calls For Ethiopia-Eritrea cease-fire

ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) — The Organization of African Unity called yesterday for a cease-fire in the border war between Ethiopia and Eritrea after Ethiopia claimed a decisive military victory. The appeal came after Ethiopian forces drove Eritrean troops out of the contested border region of Badme in a ground offensive backed by artillery and fighter planes.

The two East African neighbors in the Horn of Africa have been contesting a largely uninhabited, rocky 390 sq km patch of land in their 1,000 kms border that has never been totally demarcated.

Eritrea had long rejected an OAU proposal to end the conflict but, in a diplomatic climbdown to match its military retreat, it said at the weekend it would comply with the plan. Ethiopia accepted the OAU proposal months ago.

KLA returns corpse as mediators visit Kosovo

PRISTINA, Serbia (Reuters) — Ethnic Albanian guerrillas in Kosovo handed over the body of one of two missing Serbs yesterday, adding to tension just as international mediators arrived to try to keep the peace process alive.

"The two were handed over. One is a body, the other is alive," a spokesman for the international verifiers overseeing a cease-fire in Kosovo said by telephone. As he spoke, US and European mediators Chris Hill and Wolfgang Petritsch arrived in Kosovo to meet ethnic Albanian leaders who face a split with hardline separatists over their support for an international autonomy plan for Kosovo.

The run-up to a new round of peace talks on March 15 has been marked by an upsurge in violence which has killed more than a dozen people.

Police outraged over 'New Yorker' cover

NEW YORK (AP) — The police union is up in arms over the current cover of The New Yorker magazine, which shows a uniformed police officer at a carnival shooting gallery shooting at human-shaped targets. The cartoon, drawn by Pulitzer Prize-winning cartoonist Art Spiegelman, includes a red sign on the front of the shooting booth that says: "41 shots 10 cents." The cover alludes to the February 4 killing of Amadou Diallo. The unarmed immigrant was shot at 41 times by four officers in the vestibule of his apartment building. A grand jury is still investigating the case. None of the officers have been charged and all four are still working on restricted duty.

"I found (the cover art) to be grossly offensive to the police in the city," said Jim Savage, acting president of the police union, the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association. The artist said he didn't draw the cover to upset anyone.

The March 8 issue of the magazine went on sale yesterday.

Report: LA smog exceeds legal limits

WASHINGTON (AP) — Residents of Los Angeles may be exposed to levels of hazardous air pollutants that are hundreds of times higher than the levels called for in the Clean Air Act, according to a report released yesterday.

The primary sources of the three pollutants examined in the report — 1,3-butadiene, formaldehyde, and benzene — were cars, trucks, and off-road vehicles.

Officials have been successful in reducing levels of toxic pollution in the area since the passage of the 1990 Clean Air Act, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said.

"What the report shows is that despite this progress, we still have a long way to go," he added.

US airstrike hits Iraqi pipeline, halts oil flow to Turkey

By JASSIN MOHAMMED

MOSUL, Iraq (AP) — A new round of US airstrikes hit northern Iraq yesterday, two days after an American attack wrecked an Iraqi pumping station that sends oil through a pipeline to Turkey, officials said.

US F15s dropped more than 30 laser-guided missiles yesterday afternoon over the northern no-fly zone in response to several incidents of Iraqi radar locking on the aircraft, Capt. Michael Blass of US European Command in Germany said.

Missiles struck Iraqi communications sites, radar relay sites and anti-aircraft artillery sites. No damage was reported to the aircraft, Blass said. The incidents happened in the vicinity of Mosul, a city about 400 km north of Baghdad.

Blass denied Iraqi reports that US planes hit or targeted an Iraqi oil pipeline running through to Turkey or one of its pumping stations.

The Iraqi government yesterday took journalists to the oil pumping station, which appeared to have been destroyed. One person was killed in the attack Sunday and two were wounded, Iraqi officials said.

In Washington, Pentagon spokesman Col. Richard Bridges said officials were investigating whether the facility may have served a dual purpose: a communications link in Iraq's air defense system as well as a link in pipeline operations.

In Turkey, an official at the oil terminal in the port of Ceyhan confirmed the flow of petroleum had stopped after the attack. UN officials in Baghdad also confirmed the interruption.

The pipeline, which runs from northern Iraq to Ceyhan, is the only

Two Iraqi pumping station employees clear debris yesterday from station 640 kms. west of Mosul in the Kurdish no-fly zone which was attacked by US planes. The attack killed one and severed the Iraqi-Turkish oil pipeline functioning pipeline in Iraq and one of only two outlets for oil exports. The other is the Gulf terminal of Mina al-Bakr.

An Iraqi oil official, Ashour Kan'an, said about 75 percent of the station was destroyed and that repairs will cost $750,000. The station is 40 km west of Mosul.

"In a few days, we expect to resume operations using alternative parts," he told The Associated Press.

Officials have said 56 percent of Iraq's oil exports flow through the pipeline. The country is exporting 2.1 million barrels a day under the oil-for-food program, which provides an exemption to UN sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

The program enables the Iraqi government to sell oil on condition that the revenue is spent on food, medicine and humanitarian goods for the country's 22 million people.

US and British planes, which patrol no-fly zones over northern and southern Iraq, have been striking Iraqi military sites on an almost daily basis since December.

The zones were set up after the 1991 Gulf War to protect Kurdish rebels in the north and Shiite Muslims insurgents in the south.

Swissair to pay SFr 195,000 per crash victim

ZURICH (Reuters) — The parent firm of Swissair, whose aircraft crashed off Canada last year killing all 229 passengers, said yesterday it would pay 195,000 Swiss francs (NIS 546,435) to the relatives of each of the victims.

Almost six months after the McDonnell Douglas MD-11 plunged into the Atlantic Ocean on September 2, SAirGroup chief executive Philippe Brugger said that 25 families had taken the airline up on its offer so far.

"I have decided, against [the advice of] our lawyers and insurers, to pay all relatives SFr 195,000 per victim as a gesture of assistance," he told a news conference.

Brugger added that accepting the payment would not affect the relatives' rights in terms of receiving final, and possibly higher, compensation.

The total sum of compensation claims from lawsuits filed so far in connection with the crash stands at $5 billion, while the claims for punitive damages — applicable only in the US — hovered around $4.5 billion, he said.

Brugger said the move to grant compensation per victim in all cases brought procedures in Europe in line with the US. Previously, compensation in Europe had been granted per family.

Twenty-two lawsuits stemming from the crash have been filed to date, Brugger said.

Boeing/McDonnell Douglas, 17 against Swissair, seven against [SAirGroup unit] SR Technics, and one against our cargo department," he said.

But Brugger said the company believes its insurance package is adequate to cover the claims.

"We are assuming that our insurance coverage is sufficient to cover all compensation claims by relatives of passengers, the state of Canada, and third parties in connection with the accident," he said.

The cause of the crash remains unknown, and Brugger said there are no new insights to report from the investigation by Canada's Transportation Safety Board.

"We are assuming that a final report cannot be expected from the investigations board before the second half of the year 2000," he said.

In a bid to determine the cause of the crash, officials are reconstructing the cockpit and first-class section of the fuselage, a task involving some 5,000 separate pieces, he said.

"But important cable fragments are still missing and the search continues for small pieces of debris on the ocean floor," Brugger said.

He said the investigations has not resulted in any revelations so far which committed the airline to take concrete operational or technical action in response.

But as a voluntary precaution, Swissair in October shut off a hi-tech entertainment system called IFEN after investigators found evidence of heat-damaged wires in part of the ceiling where wiring for the IFEN and many other systems are placed.

The plane crashed into the Atlantic about five miles off the hamlet of Peggy's Cove in Nova Scotia as it tried to make an emergency landing at Halifax International Airport. The plane was en route to Geneva from New York.

Just minutes before the crash, the flight crew reported smoke in the cockpit.

Clues from the wreckage have prompted US safety investigators to ask the Federal Aviation Administration to order checks of cockpit wiring in other MD-11s.

Clinton returning early from vacation

By KEVIN GALVIN

PARK CITY, Utah (AP) — President Bill Clinton yesterday cut short a Utah vacation to return to Washington and get home a day early from a ski outing with his wife and daughter.

White House spokesman Barry Toiv said there was no emergency or urgent reason for Clinton to return. "They just decided they would leave today."

Clinton arrived here on Saturday to join his wife Hillary and daughter Chelsea for a ski weekend. The first lady and her daughter skied on Sunday; the president is not a skier. He tried it once 15 years ago in Sun Valley, Idaho, where he took repeated tumbles and finished the day with torn ligaments in his left knee.

Chelsea, who turned 19 on Saturday, was to have returned to Stanford University yesterday; the president and his wife were to have remained until today.

Pressed on why the Clintons were leaving, Toiv said, "They have a full schedule the rest of the week" and decided to "get home a day early."

Clinton told reporters en route to Park City from a fund-raising visit to Los Angeles that he was looking forward to a long weekend of reading, with no bigger plans than perhaps a trip into town for coffee.

The Clintons had a private dinner and a birthday cake Saturday night for Chelsea as she turned 19.

It was the second straight year they have celebrated her birthday here.

The first lady and Chelsea were spotted on the slopes Sunday by photographers and cameramen. Mrs. Clinton was overheard expressing irritation to Secret Service agents about someone who had skied too close to her.

As they did last year, the Clintons stayed at the home of Hollywood producer Jeffrey Katzenberg, who lent them his estate in the Deer Valley Resort. Katzenberg has several intermediate ski runs just off his backyard.

Toiv said Clinton got a national security report every day except Sunday, but that a national security official was on standby if needed to brief him.

Last year, the president strolled Park City's Main Street, shaking hands and visiting the historic jail.

Katzenberg, co-partner with Steven Spielberg and David Geffen in DreamWorks SKG, is a big campaign donor to Clinton and other Democrats. The former Walt Disney Co. studio chief is a frequent guest at the White House and Clinton has stayed at his Malibu, California, home.

Test of leadership

The difficult and painful images of talented young men whose lives were cut short in their 20s and 30s being laid to rest - especially when they come in as rapid a succession as they have recently - only make the silence and paralysis of thought in the nation's leadership all the more noticeable. Given that a general election is coming up in less than three months and that a wide-ranging public debate over how to find an end to the grinding war of attrition that the IDF is fighting in south Lebanon is taking place, one might expect that the major contenders for the position of prime minister would make the issue a central focus of their campaigns. But instead of exhibiting leadership and explaining in detail how they propose to solve the quandary the IDF is stuck in, the candidates seek to avoid the subject at every opportunity. When they are pressed to address the matter, the best they seem to be able to do is to provide a not very convincing case for continuing the painful status quo.

The two Hizbullah actions against IDF forces in the past week, and the victims that they claimed, were heavy in poignant symbolism of how deeply entrenched the IDF is in a situation in which its hands are tied, and how futile numerous proposed solutions have been. The vehicle that was blown apart near Kafr Shaba on Sunday was a strongly armored, bulletproof Mercedes leading a heavily armed convoy. It was nevertheless sent twisting into the air as a burning wreck by a simple roadside bomb. The fact that the convoy had changed its planned route only hours prior to the bomb's detonation indicates that the roadside bomb was probably not deliberately aimed at Brig.-Gen. Erez Gerstein. What was deliberate was the desire to cause random damage to the IDF, because it is precisely random sources of attack that a conventional army finds most difficult to deal with.

Gerstein, who will be laid to rest today at 38, was the head of the IDF's Liaison Unit to South Lebanon, which meant that he was the senior officer in charge of the IDF's relations with the South Lebanon Army, a force that Israel once hoped would develop into an independent fighting unit which would relieve it of the brunt of the burden of the fighting in south Lebanon, but which has long since failed to live up to these expectations. In the car with him, alongside his faithful driver, Chief Warrant Officer Imad Abu Rish, and his radio operator, St.-Sgt. Omer Alkabetz, was Ilan Roeh, Israel Radio's reporter in the North. The fact that a journalist was riding alongside the general underscores the extent to which military operations are now exposed to media scrutiny. In contrast to what might have been the case 30 years ago, today the IDF's successes and failures are broadcast into every home in Israel.

The clash with Hizbullah guerrillas that took the lives of three soldiers last week hit one of the IDF's most prominent commando strike forces. Israel became a world leader in conventional and commando tactics during the years in which it was faced with the challenges of fighting all-out wars and combating terrorism. In both cases, the IDF succeeded very well in overcoming the challenges. Faced with the riddle of fighting a guerrilla war with a conventional army, however, the IDF has proven to be as baffled as were the British, Americans, and Soviets.

The basic difficulties of fighting guerrilla battles - especially against an enemy that has proven itself to be cunning and tough, such as Hizbullah - are well known. Hizbullah, which is not forced to defend a well-defined territory, can hide among the population and easily determine the place and time of its hit-and-run attacks, while avoiding the IDF's far superior firepower. While a success rate of 75 percent in a conventional war is usually enough for victory, a similar or even higher IDF success rate in southern Lebanon is perceived by the public as a blood-letting. The overall effect of a long, bloody drawn-out war of attrition is bound to wear down more quickly the domestic consensus in a democratic society such as Israel's than in an authoritarian regime.

None of the methods that have historically ended guerrilla wars are easily available or implementable in Lebanon. Depriving Hizbullah of the support of a significant proportion of the population in southern Lebanon is not a realistic option. Sustained, hard-hitting strikes against Hizbullah's sanctuaries, bases, and supply routes are difficult to initiate, given both the Grapes of Wrath understandings and the fact that such actions run the risk of entangling Israel with Hizbullah's patron, Syria. Micro-attacks frustrate Hizbullah planning to some extent but are not decisive, and often draw Katyusha fire against Galilee, which domestic Israeli opinion cannot tolerate. Unilateral withdrawal would pull the IDF out of the quagmire, but could further expose the North to ceaseless rocket attacks by an emboldened Hizbullah encouraged by Syria. Negotiations with the fictitiously sovereign state of Lebanon will be futile without Syrian acquiescence at the least, which will inevitably mean conducting long and difficult negotiations with Syria on the Golan Heights.

It is when faced with such formidable challenges that true leaders are expected to rise to the occasion and prove that they have the capacities to take the decisions needed to rectify the situation and at the same time forge a stable enough public consensus to implement perhaps painful initiatives. Ehud Barak, Yitzhak Mordechai, and Benjamin Netanyahu have all had extensive experience dealing with the Lebanon situation on a number of levels. It is incumbent on them to come to the electorate and clearly enunciate what they intend to do about the war in south Lebanon if they wish to obtain a mandate for action after the elections. Simply promising more of the same is not satisfactory.

Leave Lebanon

URI DROMI

The two recent bloody events in Lebanon must have filled every Israeli with frustration and rage. After almost two decades of fighting on this cursed piece of earth, and trying everything under the sun, it seems that we are back at square one.

The mightiest power in the Middle East looks helpless against a bunch of resilient guerrilla fighters, who operate smoothly within the friendly the Vietcong. Soon enough, it found itself up to its neck in the Vietnamese quagmire, wavering between numerous aims: chasing the Vietcong in the jungles; "pacifying" villages; messing with the rotten local politics; fighting regular North Vietnamese units; and eventually bombing North Vietnam.

The lack of clear strategy and the feeling of deadlock produced frantic, even pathetic efforts to

Then make sure Syria understands the consequences of any more attacks on the North

Lebanese population, enjoy the benefit of good intelligence, target elite Israeli units and high-ranking officers, and - adding insult to injury - shell the north of Israel at will.

Sending our aircraft to pound at the Hizbullah's bases in the Bekaa Valley might boost our morale for a while and impair the organization's capacity for a short time, but it will not solve the problem.

What, then, should we do next? Strike at vital civilian targets in Lebanon, to force its government to curb Hizbullah's activity? Siege Beirut? Bomb the villages out from their homes in the south, making them cry so loud that the whole world, even Damascus, will hear and do something?

Alas, we have tried all that and more, but to no avail.

The reason for our frustration and rage lies in the absence of clear, solid and coherent strategy. What exactly are our aims in staying in Lebanon? What is the purpose of the security zone, if the Hizbullah has managed time and again to infiltrate down to the border? And what kind of security is this when the Hizbullah can launch Katyushas that will soon reach the outskirts of Haifa?

The analogy to Vietnam is worn out, but nonetheless important in demonstrating our flaws of strategy in Lebanon.

When America first went to Vietnam, its purpose was to assist the South Vietnamese in fighting boast of a success, any success.

All that time, the North Vietnamese military genius General Giap pulled the strings from Hanoi, bleeding the US forces and watching with satisfaction how American morale at home was being steadily undermined by the daily, gruesome TV coverage from the battlefield.

The sad irony is that the US armed forces performed magnificently in the Vietnam War (as shown in a book called The System Worked). With its flawed strategy, however, all the bombs in the American arsenal couldn't change the course of events. By failing to take the bull by the horns, i.e. defeating the true perpetrator, Giap, the greatest power on earth was forced to go home humiliated.

UNLIKE the US, we can't just wash our hands of Lebanon and "go home."

What we can and must do, however, is first declare our intention to withdraw to the international border. By so doing, we will write the whole Israeli public behind a just cause, gain the support and sympathy of the world, strip the Hizbullah of its ideological raison d'être, and free ourselves from the chains of the "understandings" with the Hizbullah (an unprecedented landmark in the history of counter-guerrilla warfare!).

We should then advise Syria that since it rules Lebanon, we are going to apply on our border with Lebanon the same rules of engagement prevailing on the Israeli-Syrian border.

Remember: That border has been quiet for the last 25 years, because Assad doesn't dare invoke the wrath of the IDF - and why should he, when he can easily harass us through his proxies in Lebanon and get away with it? By doing this we will also restore the deterrence of our army, which has been for so long eroded by its misuse in Lebanon.

If our unilateral move is followed by more attacks from Lebanon, and we are forced to launch another Operation Accountability, then it should be aimed at the real villain, namely Syria. If Hafez Assad chooses to meet us at the negotiation table, he will be surprised at how much we are willing to trade for real peace, which will also conclude the Lebanon affair. But if he decides to go on with his dirty tricks in Lebanon, he should meet our iron fist.

Could this escalate into a full scale war with Syria? Not necessarily. The cautious Assad, while a master of brinkmanship, has in the past shown his reluctance to be drawn to a crisis not on his own terms. In the meantime, we should turn the tables on him.

And once he starts paying the bill for his insurgency, the Hizbullah will freeze its operations against Israel immediately. Such are the rules of the game in this region. It's time we start playing by them.

Our own 'independent counsel'

EVELYN GORDON

Though Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr did not succeed in getting rid of President Bill Clinton, his investigation may nonetheless have a far-reaching impact on the US government. With the impeachment trial over, the Senate has proceeded to the next piece of business generated by Starr's probe. Its Governmental Affairs Committee is holding hearings on whether to extend, revise or cancel the law that made Starr's actions possible: the Independent Counsel Act.

This law requires the attorney-general to seek the appointment of an independent counsel if there is evidence of criminal behavior by a senior government official. The counsel is chosen by three federal judges, and can be removed only by a similar panel.

The rationale for the law was that the attorney-general, being subordinate to the government, could not be trusted to investigate crimes by highly-placed officials. Passed in 1978, with Watergate still fresh in legislators' minds, it initially commanded strong bipartisan support.

Now, however, there appears to be equally strong bipartisan sentiment in favor of drastically limiting the act, or scrapping it altogether. In the wake of the Clinton impeachment, the possible abuses of the system have become all too evident.

The fact that Starr sometimes seemed to be conducting a personal vendetta against Clinton was the least of the problems. Even were he driven by the purest of motives, the fact remains that this system gave him the power to disrupt the entire government for months over an issue most Americans considered trivial.

Furthermore, as Republican Senator Mitch McConnell noted in explaining his opposition to the law, it has had the perverse effect of "diminish[ing] the importance of ethics in government." Once an investigation has been turned over to an independent counsel, the public feels it can stop caring about the issue.

Israelis have tended to view the Clinton affair with the smug assurance that "it could never happen here." The disturbing truth, however, is that a succession of court rulings have granted Israel's attorney-general the same total independence enjoyed by Starr - even though Israel's top prosecutor is still nominally subservient to the government. And the country has already begun reaping the same fruits of its folly as America.

ATTORNEYS-GENERAL here already can - and do - get innocent people thrown or kept out of office, thanks to a High Court of Justice ruling requiring indicted ministers to resign. In 1996, for instance, then attorney-general Michael Ben-Yair used a planned indictment to deny Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan - who was later acquitted in court - the Internal Security portfolio.

An even more egregious example was Ben-Yair's investigation of then justice minister Yaakov Neeman that same year. Immediately after Neeman was appointed, Ben-Yair suddenly decided that an allegation both police and prosecution had ignored for the past four years - that Neeman had suborned a witness - was so serious that it made an immediate investigation imperative.

Ben-Yair knew he was unlikely to be able to indict, since both Neeman and the witness had consistently denied the accusation. However, the probe forced Neeman to resign.

When, as expected, he failed to uncover enough evidence to charge Neeman in this affair, Ben-Yair was still not content to let the matter drop. Instead, he filed perjury charges against Neeman on account of an affidavit the latter had submitted while trying to disprove the allegations of suborning a witness.

The Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court not only dismissed the charges, but sharply criticized the prosecution for having brought them. But by the time this verdict was handed down, the Justice Ministry had already been given to someone else.

The "diminished importance of ethics in government" cited by McConnell is also evident here. Consider the 1997 Bar-On Affair, in which Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu allegedly named Roni Bar-On attorney-general in exchange for Bar-On's willingness to drop criminal charges against MK Aryeh Deri.

An exhaustive investigation turned up no evidence to support this allegation, but it did turn up an ugly fact: that Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi had lied to the cabinet while advocating the appointment.

In any normal democracy, this would have created a public outcry for Hanegbi's resignation. Israelis, however, have delegated all such moral judgments to their independent expert: the attorney-general.

Thus, when Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein reached the only possible legal conclusion - that Hanegbi's behavior, though despicable, was not indictable - the public outcry against Hanegbi's ethical atrocity suddenly disappeared.

Israel has not yet experienced a fiasco that can match the Clinton impeachment for sheer magnitude. But wisdom often consists of learning from others' mistakes. The Knesset should take steps now to place reasonable limits on the attorney-general's power.

Double standard

MITZANA DARSHAN-LEITNER

As the attorney who represented Samuel Sheinbein, the Maryland teenager accused of murder, in his initial court proceedings in Israel, I have witnessed first-hand the Clinton administration's and Attorney-General Janis Reno's immense efforts to secure the transfer of the defendant to the US for prosecution.

With last week's Supreme Court decision that Sheinbein is not extraditable and will instead stand trial in Israel, the matter should be put to rest.

What surprises me - and many Israelis - is that neither the administration, nor the Congressmen who have taken an interest in the Sheinbein case, have ever asked Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to hand over to the US the Palestinian terrorists who have been identified as having taken part in the murders of Americans and are now living in Arafat's territory.

Why the loud demands to hand over an Israeli suspected of killing an American, but total silence regarding the seven Palestinian Arabs who killed Americans in recent years? Five of the seven are roaming free; the other two are in Arafat's custody, but probably not for very long, given his notorious "revolving door" justice system.)

Just because Sheinbein is not being extradited does not mean he will necessarily go free. On the contrary, he will undoubtedly continue to be held without bail until his trial, during which US legal officials will be able to assist the Israeli prosecutors in making their case in court.

If Sheinbein is convicted, he will certainly receive a severe prison sentence; life imprisonment is the usual punishment for crimes of this nature. The American public can rest assured that the punishment he would receive in Israel would be comparable to what he would receive in the US.

By contrast, Palestinian Arabs who murder Americans are treated like heroes by Arafat. Consider the case of Abu Abbas, who masterminded the 1985 hijacking of the Achille Lauro, in which a wheelchair-bound American tourist, Leon Klinghoffer, was murdered. Abbas was welcomed by Arafat in Gaza for the PLO's Palestine National Council session in 1996 - just days after the Sharm el-Sheikh summit convened by President Bill Clinton, at which Arafat pledged to fight terrorism! Abbas returned in the spring to Gaza, where he is living openly, thumbing his nose at American and Italian justice.

Or consider the case of Amin el-Hindi. He masterminded the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre in which weightlifter David Berger, a Cleveland native, was murdered. Hindi is currently chief of the PLO's General Intelligence Service.

A MORE recent case involves David Boim, an American-Israeli teenager who was murdered by Palestinian terrorists in May 1996. I have represented the Boim family in legal proceedings related to the case, and I have witnessed their pain and anguish. The pain of their son being murdered has been compounded by the anguish of watching the PA briefly arrest the killer, Injad Hinawi, and then let him out for a "weekend furlough" from which he did not return.

After Congressional protests, Arafat arrested Hinawi earlier this year, gave him a five-minute trial, and sentenced him to 10 years in prison. That's an outrageously light sentence for murder. Even worse, there is little chance Hinawi will stay in prison that long, since many other terrorists whom Arafat has sentenced to jail terms were set free after just a few months.

Israel had also been urging Arafat to arrest the second suspect in the murder of David Boim, Khalil Ibrahim Sharif. But Arafat refused to lift a finger. Sharif later turned up as one of the three suicide bombers who blew themselves up on Jerusalem's Ben-Yehuda Street in September, killing five passersby - including a 14-year-old schoolgirl: from California, Yael Borwin. If the PA authorities had arrested Sharif he never would have been able to take part in the Ben-Yehuda bombing. Yael Borwin might still be alive.

If Arafat and the PA could be trusted to seriously prosecute and punish the Arab killers of Americans, most Americans would probably not object to Arafat's refusal to extradite those killers.

But Arafat refuses to prosecute or punish them - some, like Amin el-Hindi, are even promoted to senior positions of authority - and therefore every American has a right to demand that those killers be handed over to the US, where they will be tried according to appropriate standards of modern justice and punished as they deserve.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STAND FOR MIXED MARRIAGE CORRECTED

Sir - Your obituary for my father, David Belin (The Jerusalem Post, January 19), highlighted his concern about outreach and Jewish survival, but misrepresented his views on rabbinic officiation at interfaith marriages.

The resolution my father proposed for debate at the 1997 convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations did not "call on Reform rabbis to officiate at interfaith marriages." Rather, it called for "respecting the right of self-determination on the part of each rabbi whether to officiate at intermarriages when there is a commitment to raise children as Jews.

Specifically, it urged the Central Conference of American Rabbis "to rescind from the first paragraph of its 1973 Resolution that language which declared 'its opposition to participation by its members in any ceremony that solemnizes a mixed marriage,' where the couple has agreed to identify as a Jewish household and raise any children as Jews."

Your obituary stated that "Belin was stymied at the 1997 convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, which saw his efforts as intruding on the Rabbinate." In fact, the resolutions committee of the UAHC did not even allow my father's proposal to be debated at that convention.

Interestingly, the committee accepted all 13 other resolutions proposed for debate that year, including several concerning secular matters (such as animal welfare and campaign finance reform) that do not address the issue of Jewish continuity.

IT'S LEG ROOM

Sir - Yoel Feldschuh, El Al general manager, in announcing the purchase of Boeing 737-800 planes ("More space for passengers"), is quoted as saying, "Jews like a lot of room for passengers." Not only is the remark a blatant stereotype against the Jewish people, Mr. Feldschuh's major market, but he is also wrong. El Al's passengers (of all persuasions) like leg room, the very item that El Al is so stingy on, and would even reduce in order to satisfy its greed of storing more passengers on each plane like packers store sardines in the can.

El Al constantly complains that it is losing passengers to its competitors because it cannot fly on the Sabbath. Passengers are seeking other airlines because of the discomfort of flying El Al. I would never fly on the Sabbath, yet can't wait until Continental Airlines starts its Newark-Tel Aviv route. At least on their planes, I will not get leg cramps sitting so uncomfortably for so many hours.

Yes, Mr. Feldschuh, Jews like lots of room for packages (as all other people do), but they like leg room even more. And the most important thing that at least this Jew dislikes is the general manager of my country's national airline making disparaging remarks about my people, as well as the major source of its revenue.

When truth is stranger than fiction

A California author writes a thriller about art stolen by the Nazis — then meets the characters in his book. Sue Fishkoff reports Looted and never located: One of the Unger family's most valuable paintings, 'The Holy Family,' attributed to Tintoretto.

Sometimes nature imitates art, and truth is more implausible than fiction.

Last August, American mystery writer Aaron Elkins put the finishing touches on his latest novel, an international art thriller called Loot published last month by William Morrow.

After sending off the manuscript, he moved to the small California town of Carmel — population 2,000 — and met his neighbor, a Jewish woman from Austria who had lived through what he wrote about in his novel.

Loot begins with a mysterious Old Master painting that is brought into a Boston pawnshop by a man with a Russian accent.

When the pawnshop owner is murdered the next day, curator-turned-investigator Ben Revere embarks on an international search for the roots of the priceless painting, and becomes embroiled in the shadowy world of art collections looted by the Nazis in the 1930s and early '40s, mostly from European Jews.

Revere's fictionalized search — and Elkins's own actual research for the book — took him to the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, Russia, a country still holding more than a million pieces of German artwork, much of it Nazi loot; to Mafia figures in Budapest, part of an international crime network that traffics in that stolen art today; and to the Altaussee salt mines of Austria, where the Nazis crated and stored mountains of pilloined paintings and sculptures (see sidebar).

BACK in real-life Carmel, California, Ruth and Richard (not their real names) are still trying to recover two Old Master paintings stolen from Ruth's family by the Nazi regime in pre-war Austria.

Ruth's father, Frederic Unger, was briefly jailed by the authorities in Vienna in the spring of 1938. He was released on condition that he turn over all his assets to the Nazi-controlled Austrian state. The core of the family's wealth was a large art collection, including about two dozen Old Master paintings.

The art was left behind, and the Ungers left Austria that summer, first for Switzerland and then on to Paris. They made a deal with the Gestapo, agreeing to pay a substantial sum of money to buy back their own art and furniture, which was shipped from Austria to Paris and kept crated in a state warehouse.

In Paris, the Ungers tried to obtain French citizenship.

"It was suggested that my parents 'donate' some paintings to the Louvre in order to streamline the process," Ruth says.

Although the Ungers themselves were unable to gain access to their stored artwork, the Louvre was able to enter and remove three paintings from the shipment: two 17th-century Dutch works and an 18th-century French painting.

"They wrote us a nice thank-you letter," Ruth recalls.

In April 1939 the family decided to use their precious American visas, and set off for New York and finally California, without having obtained either French citizenship or the rights to their crated art collection, which remained behind in Paris.

Even after the German invasion, and right up until the US entered the war in December 1941, the Ungers continued negotiating with the puppet French government, paying spurious storage costs and insurance for their paintings.

After the war, almost all of the Ungers' stolen paintings were restored to them with the help of the US Army's Monuments, Fine Arts and Archives recovery division.

Many of the Ungers' paintings showed up on German shipping records recovered by the Allies after the war, including a list of pictures destined for transport from Paris to Nikolsburg on November 15, 1943.

On that same list were paintings owned by the Kamm, a prominent art-dealer family, and the Rothschilds.

"At least our paintings were stolen in good company," Richard comments.

MOST of Unger's paintings were found by American soldiers in various places in Germany, where they had been shipped during the war. Five of the paintings never left Paris — the French underground found them at Liberation, loaded aboard trains destined for Germany.

"They were still shipping out paintings, even as the Allies moved in," marvels Richard.

The two paintings in Austria, held by the Kunsthistorische and the Albertina museums, were returned to the Ungers only after three years of lawsuits. As one point, Richard says, the museums offered the Ungers several other, less valuable paintings in exchange.

"Their final argument in court was, 'If you bring back all the other paintings into Austria, you can have these ones back,'" says Richard.

The Austrian High Court ruled against the museums.

The Louvre proved a more difficult adversary. When Frederic Unger asked for his three paintings back after the war, Richard relates, the French state museum insisted they had been given "as a gift."

The family's two Dutch paintings still hang today in the Louvre's galleries, with a plaque identifying them as "donated by the Unger family." The third painting seems to have disappeared.

A French government official told the family, according to Richard, "If the museum had to give back all the paintings we acquired under dubious circumstances, we'd have nothing on our walls."

Two of the family's Old Master paintings, however, were never located.

"They were considered the most valuable of my father's collection," says Unger's daughter.

One was a "holy family" scene, attributed to Tintoretto. The other was a late 15th-century Madonna and Child, by Jacopo del Sellaio, a contemporary of Botticelli.

Frederic Unger died in 1954, and his wife passed away in 1994.

Last year, Ruth read a New York Times story about the World Jewish Congress's Commission for Art Recovery. She wrote to the commission, and sent pictures of the two missing paintings.

In December, the news came back: The Sellaio had been sold at auction in 1985 by Christie's of London.

Ruth and Richard are now trying to locate the buyer, and stake their claim to the painting stolen from Frederic Unger more than 60 years ago.

More than a million works of art were looted by the Nazis during their reign of terror. About 110,000 paintings — and at least that number of smaller objects such as furnishings, jewelry and valuable coins — were never returned to their original owners, according to Dr. Constance Lowenthal, director of the WJC's art recovery commission.

Today, more than 50 years after the war, there has been a worldwide burst of interest in recovering goods and money taken from European Jews by the Nazis. And after years of silence, Lowenthal says, cases of rediscovered stolen artwork "are coming out of the woodwork."

There are relatively few cases, however, where such stolen art is found and its ownership is contested in court. In fact, Lowenthal says she knows of only about 20 such cases in the past 15 years.

The Carmel case is one of them, she says.

"We are on the trail of it," she states.

But the couple's chances of recovering their Sellaio depend greatly on where the painting is physically located today, because they would have to bring their lawsuit in that country.

In Britain or North America, Lowenthal explains, common law applies. A person cannot get "good title," or legal ownership, of a thing that was stolen from someone else. Legal ownership remains with the original thief victim.

If the Sellaio is located in one of those countries, Ruth and Richard's chances of recovery are greater than if it is found elsewhere in Europe, where civil law applies. According to civil law, a person who buys an object "in good faith" has as much right to it, if not more, than the original owner, even if the object was stolen.

This "good-faith purchaser" rule figures prominently in Elkins's book, where three separate characters all claim to "own" the painting in question: two who claim it was stolen from them by the Nazis, and one, a Hungarian art dealer, who claims he bought it after the war "in good faith" from a reputable dealer.

"Let's say someone buys a painting for $1 million from Christie's, and someone else comes forward and says, 'That's my painting, it was stolen from me,'" Elkins posits. "If the buyer gives it back, who will reimburse him his $1 million?" Christie's?

"This is a problem the courts haven't worked out yet: the 'good-faith purchaser' who buys a painting from a reputable source. How do you make amends?"

With no international standard by which to judge such cases, and with original ownership so difficult to determine, Lowenthal says, "Lawsuits to recover stolen art tend to be long, drawn-out affairs."

Ruth and Richard aren't sure what they'll do.

"There's no guarantee that the person who bought it from Christie's hasn't sold it again, privately," says the son-in-law. It hasn't been sold at any of the major art auction houses since 1985, because that information would show up on computer databases.

"We don't even know what country it's in," says Ruth.

While her husband would "like to see justice done," she says her major interest is more sentimental. "I'd like to see the painting again," she says wistfully. "It's been more than 60 years since I've seen it, and I was very fond of it."

The comic rabbi of Hollywood

Not Page One

Sam Orbaum

You have to go to Haredi Har Nof to catch the best show in town. It's free, there's no minimum, and no cover (except for the one you have to put on your head).

It's Rabbi David Orlofsky's shiur (lecture), and it's Torah talk with a twist: It's the best stand-up comedy east of the Borscht Belt.

"You ever see the typical rabbi?" Orlofsky says in an impromptu interview.

He affixes a puckish expression and intones monotonously: "I'd like to beguiliin. With a humorous stormy. I'm sure everybody will enjoyoooy."

There was a mis- he snaps back to Orlofsky: "Sometimes I'll do a really, really funny shiur, people will be on the floor, and they'll say to me later, 'What a powerful message.' And I'll say, 'I didn't think anyone got it.'"

He's a brilliant performer: the timing, the body language, the facial expressions, the pregnant pauses, the stage presence — not to mention great material: the Torah.

"Moshe Rabbeinu, from the time he's born until Parshas Terzaveh [last week's Torah portion], is in every single parsha, with one exception — Terzaveh. What happened to him? Why is he left out?"

"Moshe tries to strong-arm God. 'If you don't forgive the Jewish people, erase me from the Book. I'm not going to be

"And I'm sure he was looking down saying, 'You left out my move!'"

"Now, he was a Jewish man. I don't know if he left behind anyone to say kaddish for him. I don't know if he gave to charity. But perhaps I should mention in public, that it was really Al Flosso who invented the backhanded feather bouquet move."

He looks heavenward. "I remember, Al." Grins and chuckles.

"That was Al's move. And that is Al Flosso's legacy."

"What's going to be our legacy, what are they going to write on our gravestone? Will we be remembered as the king of scrap iron? I saw that once in an obituary. 'The king of scrap iron.' I don't remember his name, forgive me [he glances heavenward]. What a legacy."

"And that's what we all read in shul this morning. Three psukim [verses]. There's going to come a time when Amalek will be forgotten, when Moshiah comes. They will be less remembered... than Al Flosso."

ORLOFSKY gives his age as "F-f-f-forty," and shakes his head. "It's frightening. I used to picture 43 as being as old as I could possibly be."

He says he's from "Lon Gislend, the Catholic part."

He's been in Israel 11 years and "I can just make myself understood in Hebrew. y'know, by yelling." He's big and beefy,

'If you remember the jokes, you can put the shiur back together. So I use the jokes as a technique to make the point' part of it. And God says, 'OK. You got it. I'll erase you from the Book.'

"At that moment it was decided that Moshe is going to be left out of one portion of the Bible. But if you had to pick one parsha to be left out of, you'd also pick Terzaveh."

"So Moshe is finishing up the Torah, and he comes to Terzaveh, and he realizes, 'Hey, I'm left out. My name's not here.' He's forgotten. But we all remember... that he's forgotten."

Orlofsky is wending toward the subject of his shiur. He weaves through a cascading litany of wit and wisdom from the Torah and everyday life.

Saturday night, this included the Torah portion, a comparison of the kohen and the Catholic priest ("He acts as a buffer between people and God. It's not very different from your average Israeli bureaucrat"), anecdotes of bureaucratic insanity, the challenges of aliyah ("You're called an oleh because the ola was the only sacrifice that was completely consumed — the burnt offering"), the darndest things his kids say, and of course Purim.

And somehow, he links it all together into one riveting message as advertised on neighborhood posters, the subject of his shiur: "The Legacy of Al Flosso."

Al Flosso?

"WHEN my father passed away, I had to decide what to put on the gravestone. I was taking a very long time. Y'know I always say, 'If I make a mistake, it doesn't matter, it's not etched in stone,' but this is etched in stone. And they said, 'How long does it take to write a gravestone?' I said, 'It takes a long time. What's his legacy?'"

"That brings me to Al Flosso. I have to admit, I don't think a shiur ever had a title that elicited the reaction of 'The Legacy of Al Flosso.' People have stopped me in the street all Shabbos, but that's normal. They just come to me and say, 'Who's Al Flosso?'"

"Al Flosso was a vaudeville magician. When I was a kid, my father took me to his store. And Al Flosso wanted me to know he was very important. He showed me a trick."

"One of the things he used to do was produce a feather bouquet [from his sleeve]. He says: 'That's my move. Blackstone took that move from me. That's my move. I invented that move! I want you to remember,' he says to me. 'Kid — that's my move.'"

"A few years later he passed away and I read his obituary in the paper. And no one mentioned ..."

suggesting that perhaps there's more than borscht behind his belt.

He's been "playing" the Zichron Yosef Synagogue for three years, and word has gotten around. On Saturday, there were about 70 men — almost all of them young, American, with black velvet kippot — and 40 women in the back rows.

But this, I am assured, is a quiet night. Sometimes, his fans tell me, it's hard to get a seat in the 700-seat shul.

Orlofsky teaches, lectures worldwide, does a Friday morning shiur (the mumbles furiously) "on a pirate radio station," Kol Simcha, 103.5. And he sells tapes of his lectures at NIS 12 each.

There's definitely method to his madness, and you can tell by the way people enter the shul: Even before Orlofsky makes his appearance, already they're smiling, glittery-eyed, anticipating a memorable hour. Afterwards, his listeners — groupies, perhaps — detain him with questions, knowing he'll give them answers with a comic spin. Orlofsky never misses a cue.

"I've got it easy by now. All I have to do is say 'good evening' and people are laughing already."

"Somebody told me once, 'I want home and I told the whole shiur to my husband.' So I said, 'How did you remember it?' She said, 'I remembered the jokes. If you remember the jokes, you can put the shiur back together. So I use the jokes as a technique to make the point.'"

STANDING at the pulpit in front of the Torah scrolls, it goes without saying his routine is clean: no smut, no dirty words. But he can poke fun at even the biggest, holiest names:

"There's an edict: For the first time in history every last Jew in the entire world will be destroyed, but Mordechai says, 'Y'know, I'm inclined to think ... this might be the reason you [Esther] became the queen. Whaddaya think?'"

You could say he chose the Holy City over Hollywood.

"I was in Los Angeles, teaching. The father of one of the kids was an agent, and he offered me a job writing for television. Of course I fantasized about doing stand-up. But I figure, you die, you go up to heaven, and God says, 'OK, y'know, I gave you talents, what did you do with them?' I say 'What, you never saw my show?' He says, 'That's it? I gave you this ability to touch people's lives and instead you decide to distract them?'"

He may only reach hundreds at a time, instead of millions, but David Orlofsky is content. This is his legacy.

A wee dram

By Judy Siegel-Itzkovich

The Whisky Plot, a CD-ROM in English, developed and marketed by Unikim Systems, Gothenburg, Sweden (www.unikim.se), requires Windows 95 and above, marketed through www.whiskyweb.com, for adults, priced at $24, including postage and handling. Rating: ****

As I can just hear those beer-bellied, two-fisted drinkers out there laughing at me — someone who drinks nothing but a little sweet wine for Shabbat kiddush or Subra liqueur on happy occasions — I'm not expert on whisky. I don't touch the stuff, nor do I remember the difference (once explained by our Irish-born columnist Thomas O'Dwyer) between whisky and whiskey.

But in software, the medium is as important as the message.

When Unikim's Fredrik Tholander e-mailed me from Sweden to offer this disk for review, I soberly warned him that Jews aren't exactly big drinkers (although they do pack away more alcohol than they did a few decades ago, putting their lives at risk of road accidents and their livers at risk of cirrhosis). Still, Tholander was eager to have this disk reviewed.

And it's done very well. The piece of software is a database of 786 types and brands of whisky produced by 222 distilleries in Ireland (six of them, Wales (one), the US (17 from Kentucky and Tennessee only), Canada (one — Seagrams, a Jewish entry, from the Bronfman family), Japan (four) and Scotland (all the rest).

The user can select any of 14 different bagpipe tunes as background music to put him in the mood; if that's not his taste, modern music can be heard instead.

Each whisky is listed with an "identity card" of its own listing the brand, distillery, related facts and address. Surprisingly, there is no picture of each bottle, or even of the whisky in a glass.

But every little detail about the schnapps is there. Each database "card" lists the peatiness (I suppose I know what that means: something like garden fertilizer?), sweetness, color, nose (that is "bouquet," isn't it, or is that only a wine term?), flavor and finish (the end of a paint job?).

Color ranges from amber to copper to yellow; nose includes fruit, grape, grass, hay, salt (?), sherry, smoky, vanilla and wood; flavor includes chocolate, heather, herbal, honey, malt, nut and pepper; and finish means dry, cream, fruity, leather (?), light and so on.

A beginner's search can be performed by sliding an arrow up and down a scale of peatiness and sweetness from 1 to 100 or within any range between those numbers. For an advanced search, choose any of the other variables.

Without knowing what I was looking for (there is certainly no Carmel King David Concord kiddush wine listed here), I found numerous entries for a copper-colored, fruit-scented, chocolate-flavored cream-finished whisky.

There is also a "filter" device that lets you leave out of the search a certain region, age, type (spelled "typ") or strength, but the program writers should have used the correct spelling "applies" instead of "applies" — although maybe that's how it sounds to whisky drinkers in Sweden.

Click on a map to see the actual locations of the distilleries in each country.

Another feature is games, symbolized by a pair of dice. But if you haven't learned all 786 brands and 222 distilleries by heart, you're in for insults.

Playing the Connect Game, in which one has to match the brands with their distilleries, I took so much time to decide that the announcer growled: "Come on — what are you waiting for?... Oh, for God's sake. I haven't got all day!"

Then, when I clicked a wrong match, he had the impudence to say: "You must be joking," and when I finally gave up, he issued his final judgment: "This is not your cup of tea..."

In the 1X2 Game, one has to answer multiple choice questions based on material from the database; in the Drag-and-Drop Game (which is how I personally felt after spending half an hour on all these quizzes), you have to sort out an anagram of jumbled letters to figure out a brand name, such as St. Magdalene or Glen Garioch 10 years old (easiest to do if you're inebriated).

Well, Fredrik, salud, cheers, down the hatch and lehim to you for this clever disk. But make sure you don't drive (even in a hard-disk drive) while you drink.

Born to be upbeat

We might think money, marital status, age and beauty determine how happy we are — but new research says we're wrong, Shari Roan writes

Shari Roan/B99

Chicago had 22 inches of snow during a single day last month. In Minot, N.D., it was 29 degrees below zero. In Alaska, it's so cold that the dog sleds are sitting idle.

From Alaska to Maine, people north of the 40th parallel are cursing the wicked winter of 1999.

But before getting too smug, those who live in warm weather should heed this little piece of advice: The climate you live in has very little to do with how happy you are.

That's the latest lesson to emerge from a body of psychological research on what makes people happy. In a recent article titled "Does Living in California Make People Happy?" psychologists found that the answer is a resounding no.

We've known, of course, for a long time that money can't buy you happiness, but researchers now are starting to understand why.

"Our research suggests a moral and a warning: Nothing that you focus on will make as much difference as you think," says David A. Schkade, a researcher at the University of Texas and co-author of the study.

Schkade and colleague Daniel Kahneman of Princeton University asked college students in the Midwest and in Southern California questions about their happiness. When rating themselves, the students in both regions were similar in their levels of happiness.

But when rating whether people like themselves would be happier living in California or the Midwest, both groups said that Californians would surely be happier.

The fact that the study, published in the September issue of Psychological Science, found that people in the Midwest expected Californians to be happier (largely because of the weather) shows a common flaw in thinking.

Various studies on happiness have found that things like weather, money, marital status, age and beauty do not significantly influence the happiness of most people — although we overwhelmingly think they do.

"We've gotten a lot of reaction to this article from people saying, 'I don't believe you that people in California aren't happier,'" Schkade said.

"People are not good judges of the effect of changing circumstances on their own life satisfaction or that of others."

The danger of misunderstanding the true origins of happiness, he says, is that "people might actually move to California in the mistaken belief that this would make them happier."

Or they might do other things — change jobs, divorce, buy a Ferrari — thinking such action is the ticket to happiness.

It won't, agrees psychologist David Lykken, author of a new book called Happiness. "The route to happiness is not winning the gold," he says. "You feel grand for a while, but it doesn't last."

The idea that happiness is not greatly affected by major life circumstances is a somewhat startling notion to some.

While the first major study in this area dates back more than 20 years, "it's really only been in the last decade that this whole area of work has begun to take off and gain wider interest," Schkade said.

That study, in 1978, found that people who became paraplegics did not become significantly unhappy because of losing their ability to walk. The same study also found that lottery winners, over time, were not greatly happier because of their new wealth.

"This article is famous because its results are deeply counterintuitive," Schkade said. "An observer would expect paraplegics to be more miserable and lottery winners to be happier than they are in actuality."

Other studies confirmed that changing circumstances don't seem to shake people from their tendencies to be either happy or unhappy.

For example, studies show that most people return to their normal levels of happiness within a year after the death of a loved one and that no particular time of life is happier than another.

Physically attractive people aren't happier, and people with disabilities aren't sadder, research has found.

PERHAPS the strongest evidence that happiness isn't found or earned was published in 1996 in a study from the Minnesota Study of Twins Reared Apart.

According to Lykken and co-author Auke Tellegen of the University of Minnesota, as much as 50 percent of a person's tendency to be happy is inherited; that is, people are born upbeat or melancholy.

The Minneapolis study looked at 254 sets of identical and fraternal twins who were separated at birth and reared apart. The happiness levels of the identical twins were strongly correlated. The researchers then studied a smaller number of the sets of twins and looked at their happiness scores — both the identical and fraternal twins — on two happiness surveys given 10 years apart.

"Among the identical twins, we found we could predict Twin B's score on the second exam from Twin A's score 10 years earlier," Lykken said. "But among fraternal twins, who share only half their genes, there was almost no predictability."

Based on this research, Lykken has proposed what he calls a "set point" theory of happiness. "This means that six months or a year after winning the lottery, people are back to their original levels of happiness — their set point," he said.

While there appears to be strong evidence that happiness is at least partially hereditary, Lykken still believes that people can change their sense of well-being.

"If things are genetic, then there is a certain fatalism around," Lykken said. "But what our studies mean is that you can let the genetic steersman have his head or try to change it."

FOR example, research has now turned toward the characteristics that depressed people tend to possess — such as persistently negative or self-deprecating thoughts — with the goal of trying to alter those characteristics.

But a possible flaw in the happiness-is-hereditary theory is that the current studies don't represent a wide range of environments in which people were raised.

More studies are needed across cultures to see whether certain environments boost or erode happiness, says University of Illinois psychologist Ed Diener, one of the leaders in describing the origins of happiness.

"The heritability figure is not a set figure but varies according to where the studies are done," he said.

Still, most people can probably accept that at least some part of personal happiness is inherited. But, Schkade said, few people buy the idea that major life events won't alter one's happiness quotient.

Take Janet McIntyre. An educated professional who is familiar with the research on happiness, she moved to Los Angeles from Chicago in December and says the change in climate has made her feel great.

"I've seen the studies that suggest people have a happiness set point," McIntyre said. "But the sunshine just makes me happier."

"January and February in Chicago are cold and very dark. To wake up and have the sunshine streaming in your windows makes the day seem like it has more possibilities." (LA Times)

I'm knee deep in creeps

Dear Ruthie,
I have a problem which is so disturbing I am too ashamed to seek help. I am only capable of having sex with men with whom I have nothing in common, who treat me badly, or who are married.

I have been trying to force myself out of this behavior for years, with no success. Every time I meet a man I like, or who is suitable in some way, any physical attraction I start to feel disappears the minute the possibility of consummation arises. This has led to quite a few embarrassing moments, when I freeze up and end up pushing away someone who really doesn't deserve it.

Then I find myself promptly in the arms of someone else who is unavailable, or a real creep. I don't know what to do. I would like to have a family some day, and at this rate I never will. Also, I always feel numb and degraded when I'm in these awful relationships.

What do you suggest?
At War, Not in Love
Somewhere in the US

Dear At War,
If you are only attracted to unsuitable suitors, fear of some kind, is probably lurking in your unconscious.

This is not an unusual emotional phenomenon as you might think. What is telling in your case, however, is the shame you are attaching to it.

That you view this problem as so embarrassing that you are unable to seek help is relevant. It is also an indication that the reason behind it is something you haven't dealt with — undoubtedly going as far back as childhood.

Your ability to engage only in sexual relations void of intimacy or long-term viability should lead you to examine your attitude toward sex altogether.

Dear Ruthie

What you are describing — numbness and degradation — could be due to early sexual experiences which were so dehumanizing as to force you to "split" yourself in half — to keep your soul untouched while your body was being ravaged. This is common to victims of incest or other forms of molestation.

If you were not such a victim, your present disconnection could be due to a different kind of fear — of commitment.

Consider the possibility that your inability to become involved sexually with someone you actually like or with whom you have something in common stems from an inner realization that the combination of sex and suitability really could lead to marriage. And though you claim to want to have a family some day, you may be resisting this inclination with all your might.

Why you might be resistant to something you claim to want only you can say. But fear of commitment is usually fear of abandonment in disguise.

In other words, as long as you remain distanced from a sexual partner, you are "protected" from the pain of losing love.

If none of this is helping to lessen your fear of professional counseling, the best thing for you to do in the meantime is take a good look at yourself. Maybe doing so will at least help alleviate some of your shame.

This, in turn, might be a step in the direction of untangling the internal knot that is preventing you from breaking your pattern on the one hand, and from seeking help on the other.

GRAPEVINE

By GREER EY CASHMAN

With censorship hurdles behind him and his book Ana Kurdi finally in print, Eliezer (Geyzi) Tsafir, who headed the Mossad's operations in Kurdistan in the mid-1970s, thought that perhaps some act of Saddam Hussein's might help promote his literary interests. He hadn't counted on the arrest of Kurdish rebel leader Abdullah Ocalan, which brought Kurdish history and aspirations back to world attention.

According to Tsafir, there is a special bond between the Kurds and the Israelis, because of parallels between Kurdish and Jewish suffering and because Kurdish military leaders, like Israelis, lead their troops into battle and mourn each and every fallen soldier.

Every member of the Mossad who engaged in undercover activities in Kurdistan came back with glowing reports on and high respect for the Kurds, says Tsafir, citing as an example David Kimche, who later became director-general of the Foreign Ministry.

"WINE and food are two sides of the same coin." Thus spoke Victor Schoenfeld, winemaker for the Golan Heights Winery, to members of the GHW Customers' Club as they pampered their palates with a multi-course gourmet meal washed down by a dozen wines, Gamla and Katzin wines ranging in vintage from 1985 to 1998.

Walters at the exclusive La Regece Grill Room at Jerusalem's King David Hotel looked like they were running a relay race as they removed wineglasses from the table and replaced them with fresh ones. Some of the tables became a little overcrowded with stemware as guests who had taken a liking to certain bouquets refused to allow them to be confiscated in favor of another. They just lined them all up and sipped from whichever glass took their fancy.

The lack of pomp brought a smile to the face of Adam Montefiore, GHW's international marketing manager, who confessed to having wine snobs.

"Whatever wine you like is right for you," he said.

WHEN Avi Blustein, director-general of the Religious Affairs Ministry, attended the annual dinner of the Ratzon Yehuda hesder yeshiva, he thought that he was just another VIP along with Yigal Bibi, deputy minister for religious affairs, and guest speaker David Bar-Ilan, the prime minister's director of communications. What Blustein didn't know until they dimmed the lights was that the dinner was also a surprise birthday party for him.

That only became clear when he was presented with an iced chocolate cake topped by a sparkler.

Waxing nostalgic, Bar-Ilan remarked that in some ways it had been easier for him to be editor of The Jerusalem Post than to be involved in decisions in the Prime Minister's Office. As editor he could write with assuredness about the right and the wrong thing to do, he said. But in government, the decision makers are often faced with choices — like in Lebanon — "where none of the options are good."

VERY few people manage to celebrate three jubilees in the space of a year — which makes Jerusalem's Artie (Aharon) and Sara Roth special. The couple, who traditionally hold an open house on Independence Day in the spacious garden of their home, last May toasted Israel's jubilee. Early this year, they celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary, and last Friday their children Rivka and Eli Montag, Hadassah (Dassi) and Haim Saban and Raya and David Roth, their grandchildren and great-grandchildren hosted a gala luncheon to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Roths' aliyah.

Former New Yorkers who represent the living history of Israel, the Roths always joke that they came for their honeymoon and are still here.

His honeymoon trip was not Artie Roth's first experience in the Middle East. As a member of the US Intelligence during World War II, he was sent to Palestine, where he spent one-and-a-half years. Back in America after the war, he was active with Teddy Kollek in recruiting arms for the Hagana.

Both Artie and Sara helped pioneer the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel and over the years have welcomed literally hundreds of newcomers to their home, offering them meals, a bed, introductions to potential employers and various other forms of assistance.

Most of those joining the Roths in their celebration were American expatriates. They included their best friends Hannah and Robbie Cherlow, Moshe Hellner, who has been here since 1946, Rabbi Chaim Lubin, Eva Blondheim, Maxine Miller, Violet Reznikoff and Shifra Gordon. Also there were Tama Goldman, Murray and Hans Greenfield, David and Florence Alexander and Zachary and Lee Dor-Shav. Had it not been Friday, the festivities would have gone on into the night. As it was, guests got an early taste of Purim with the distribution of colorful hats, masks, whistles and noisemakers.

"LET this gathering be an image of our future" suggested Msgr. Pietro Sambri, Apostolic Nuncio in Israel, as he surveyed the large gathering of Jews, Christians and Moslems at the annual meeting of the Interreligious Coordinating Council in Israel.

Speaking on relations between Rome and Jerusalem toward the millennium, Sambri forecast that the year 2000 would witness great movement between the two cities.

Moreover, Catholic pilgrims going to Rome from the Americas and Asia will include the Holy Land, "because the price of the ticket will be the same."

AN Italian experience has led to an Austria-Israel alliance. When Andreas Martinelli, creative director at Wolford, the Austrian-based, up-market legwear and bodysuit manufacturer, was working for the Rati company in Italy, he was impressed by the skills and technological ability of two Shenkar College interns who were there soaking up the Italian fashion scene.

After joining Wolford, which has boutiques in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, Martinelli said that if he was coming to Israel to look at the company's boutiques, he might just as well pay a visit to Shenkar to select a couple of students to spend three months with a company where "hi-tech meets high fashion."

During his lightning visit, Martinelli interviewed suitable candidates, two of whom will have an all-expenses-paid learning experience in Austria. They will also have an opportunity to contribute their own skills and knowledge to Wolford. If the experiment proves successful, the relationship between Wolford and Shenkar will continue.

EVEN though he contemplated contesting Binyamin Netanyahu for the Likud leadership, Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert has stated publicly that no government of Israel has worked so staunchly for the interests of Jerusalem as the one headed by Netanyahu. It's for that reason — and the anticipation of some tangible support for the capital's sadly depleted coffers — that Olmert is making the municipal chambers available for a cabinet session on March 14.

Whether the premier can help the city to overcome its deficit is another story. Finance Minister Meir Sheerit is said to have a particularly tight hold on the national purse strings.

OPENING their Drugstore 2000 supermarket in Jerusalem on Shabbat has saved owners Yitzhak Eisenkott and Moshe Abergil a small fortune in advertising costs. As a result of the harsh threats and demonstrations against them for doing business on Shabbat, they've received so much publicity that the whole country knows about them.

ADDRESSING the National Convention of the Israel Hotel Association, Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav had trouble winding his tongue around the name of fellow VIP guest Ben-Zion Zilberfarb, the Finance Ministry director-general. After Katsav repeatedly stumbled over the pronunciation, someone in the audience tried to help him out by translating it into Hebrew (zeva kesef (silver color)).

"This is when we really need a Ben-Gurion," said Katsav alluding to the insistence of Israel's first prime minister that civil servants Hebraicize their names.

A band for the disenfranchised

By David Brinn

Counting Crows took America, and consequently the rest of the world, by storm with its 1994 debut, August & Everything After, led by the spooky Dylan/Van Morrison melange of "Mr. Jones."

ACROSS A WIRE - LIVE IN NEW YORK
Counting Crows
(Red Arts)

UNIVERSAL
(NMC)

LOOKING FOR LOVE
Various Artists
(Helicon)

Smart, passionate and spirited, it's no wonder that the band, fronted by the enigmatic Adam Durwitz, was tagged with the moniker "modern rock for people who hate modern rock." Disenfranchised, aging boomers suddenly found a band who loved the values, sound and commitment of the late 1960s. A 1996 follow-up witnessed the band in a holding pattern which forced them into an early career crossroads.

The live, double disc Across a Wire - Live in New York, released last year but only surfacing on these shores recently, can therefore be seen either as a gutsy move bordering on the arrogant, or a last-gasp chance to jumpstart the band's career.

Comprised of an acoustic unplugged disc from a 1997 VH1 Storytellers session, and an electric in-concert show recorded for MTV's Live from the 10 Spot, Across a Wire gives ample evidence that Counting Crows is a great live band. The unplugged disc presents the group in various configurations with acoustic guitars and piano. Durwitz's tortured vocals, angst-ridden lyrics and expressive twists on melody really shine here on material based primarily from the first two discs.

The band gets its turn to excel on the electric set, where it's able to stretch out on the more rigid recorded arrangements. Whatever reason the band decided to release a live disc now is irrelevant, as the familiar songs are performed with such gusto and conviction that it's almost like hearing them again for the first time.

Like writer Bill Flanagan explains in the liner notes, it may not be logical for a band with only two discs to release a live double set, but one listen to Across a Wire will show it makes all the sense in the world.

MAYBE it's that Arctic Circle weather, but the pop artists emerging out of Iceland in the post-Bjork era continue to possess a stubborn streak of individuality. The latest to sound like no other is 25-year-old Reykjavik native Moa on her debut disc Universal.

The music is a kaleidoscope of offbeat cabaret, cocktail jazz, hinged by a post-modern drum & bass electronics rhythm. But what makes this more than run-of-the-mill musical anarchy is Moa's husky, yet girlish voice which sounds like a cross between Billie Holiday and Eartha Kitt.

Primary attention has been given to Moa's striking looks (sort of a Nordic Uma Thurman) but her truly continental sound should quickly shift attention to her equally striking music. Bordering on the weird and wacky, Moa definitely beats to a different drum machine.

LOOKING for Love, an all-female 16-song theme compilation by Helicon, tries to have it both ways by presenting hard-hitting, visionary artists alongside conventional schmaltzy pop.

In the former category, you can find standout tracks by Skunk Anansie, Sheryl Crow, PJ Harvey and Neneh Cherry, who stake claims for uncharted musical and emotional territory.

But for every successful excursion, there's another musical equivalent of loitering, with the main offenders being Jennifer

Paige and Karen Ramirez, who offers the weak title track. Less than sterling tracks by topnotch singer/songwriters like Suzanne Vega and Tanita Tikaram round out this uneven collection, which may have sounded good on paper. It simply doesn't create a cohesive mood, but instead sounds like what it is - wildly disparate styles masquerading under one gender.

And frankly, as a male, I find the concept that women are the only candidates to sing about love as offensive. I look forward to the upcoming male counterpart, Trolling for Sex.

Gershwin survives

JAZZ REVIEW

If any proof was needed that jazz is the most cosmopolitan of art forms, it was in ample supply last Thursday when black Brazilian reed player Paulo Moura took the Tel Aviv Cinematheque

Paulo Moura Plays Gershwin
Mikki Shaviv and the Blue-Eyed Brotherhood
'Jazz Blues & Videotape'
Tel Aviv Cinematheque
February 25

stage with a septet, and proceeded to play an assortment of pieces composed by a white Jewish American with strong Russian roots.

Right from that most scintillating and emotive of openings - the long liting musical apotheosis that signals the start of Rhapsody in Blue - Moura's clarinet and, later, tenor sax produced nothing but the purest of Jewish colors and tones.

Of course, being Brazilian, a fair amount of bossa nova managed to inveigle its way into some of the octet's interpretations, and sometimes Moura tended to sound more like Stan Getz than Gershwin. But, particularly when violinist Jerry Milavsky and pianist Joe Mores Pontes were on hand, Gershwin's spirit shone through the cultural pastiche with ever-increasing clarity.

THERE are those who claim that, musically, Israelis just can't get to grips with modern American culture - particularly rock and the blues. At least in terms of the latter, that view was peremptorily dispelled by our very own Mikki Shaviv. Admittedly, Shaviv spent 10 years in Canada, but it was an essentially homegrown sabra who produced the most electrifying of blues sounds from his turquoise-colored guitar.

Backed by the pounding, earthy drumming of Re'a Mochi'ach, the sweeping Hammond organ tones of Eyal Klein, and an energetic young reed trio of Mitchell Rodan, Ilan Arad and Udi Chodenovski, Shaviv sped his way through a mix of his own blues compositions, a sound bite or two gleaned from his commercial heyday in the '80s with rock group Tango, and several numbers from the musical folklore of the Deep South.

Proof that Shaviv's status in the local musical fraternity did not suffer during his North American sojourn was provided by an impressive array of local icons, including the likes of Arik Lavi, Gidi Gov and Shmulik Krausz, who made guest appearances. The decibel level may have been a bit hard on the ears but Shaviv's driving guitar playing and full-blooded singing - both in English and Hebrew - were in undeniable view.

Timely Kronos cadences

I have heard the Kronos Quartet several times in concert. I have listened to almost all their numerous discs over the last 25 years. The Kronos experience is more

Kronos Quartet
Rishon LeZion Auditorium
February 28

exciting on disc than live. Their concert-hall appearances seem geared to recreating the disc atmosphere. On stage, with their string instruments miked and with lighting and attire more akin to the pop than the classical music world, they sound as though they are emerging from a sound system.

But all that changed in their concert Sunday evening in Rishon LeZion in front of an enthusiastic house. Suddenly Kronos emerged as a mesmerizing musical foursome which engaged the audience from the beginning of their program to its very end.

Whether playing one of their signature pieces, Steve Reich's classic Different Trains, or music by contemporary composers from Argentina or Yugoslavia, the musicianship, the utmost sincerity and involvement in the music was more than obvious.

The real excitement came in the program's second half. This part featured 14 short pieces (the longest not over eight minutes), which ranged from the ninth and 14th centuries to compositions written in this decade.

The swift, almost natural move from De Machaut to Part and from Purcell to Schnittke charmed the audience and let it grasp that 14th- and 15th-century music is much closer to contemporary music than the 18th-19th century repertoire.

New cellist Jennifer Culp blends perfectly into the quartet and the only request I do have is to cut the pop lighting and to occasionally play more substantial works as well.

This was an evening to remind us that the musicians of our age have a clear obligation to the music written in their time if they ever want to wean the audience from the classical and romantic periods.

Oscar's big song squabble

By ROBERT W. WELKOS

TWO Grammy Award-winning composers are involved in a battle over an Oscar nomination given to the song "When You Believe" from the animated DreamWorks film The Prince of Egypt.

The nomination for best original song went to Stephen Schwartz, a past Oscar winner for Pocahontas and a well-known composer of such Broadway musicals as Pippin and Godspell. But now, Kenny "Babyface" Edmonds, who has written songs for top recording stars from Celine Dion to Toni Braxton, thinks the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences snubbed him by not including him in the nomination as well.

Edmonds said in an interview Tuesday that his omission came as a direct result of Schwartz refusing to co-sign an application that would have made Edmonds eligible for an Oscar.

"I'm in a very unfair situation, and I don't think it just happened this way," Edmonds said. "I am not eligible because I think someone purposefully made me ineligible."

The controversy arose because there are two versions of the same song. One version of "When You Believe," recorded by Whitney Houston and Mariah Carey, has climbed the pop charts. While Schwartz wrote the song, Edmonds supplied additional music for that rendition.

But there is also a second version of the song contained in the body of the film that Schwartz wrote alone. It is sung by actress Michelle Pfeiffer and a singer named Sally Dworsky, and even contains a section in Hebrew. This is the song that was nominated for an Oscar.

Houston and Carey have been asked to perform the song at the Oscars telecast on March 21, but academy officials say they won't be singing their hit pop single.

Instead, they will be asked to perform a new arrangement of the Pfeiffer-Dworsky song.

"The songs are almost always rearranged for the Oscar show anyway," said Bruce Davis, the academy's executive director.

BUT Tuesday, a publicist for Carey said the two singers expected to perform the Schwartz-Babyface rendition and only that rendition.

Under academy rules, the songwriter - not the studio - is required to submit the Oscar application.

When informed that the academy would have them perform another version, Edmonds replied: "If they are asked to perform a different kind of version, I don't know if they would want to do that. I don't know if Clive Davis (who heads Carey's label, Arista Records) would be interested in that. We do so much to get them to sing that version that to change it now wouldn't be easy."

Edmonds' attorney, Peter Lopez of Los Angeles, said that Edmonds is contractually credited with writing 15 percent of the Houston-Carey version of "When You month, friends and acquaintances began calling Edmonds from all over the country to congratulate the composer on his nomination.

But what they didn't know was that behind the scenes, Edmonds had tried to get Schwartz to co-sign the application so he could enter the Houston-Carey song but that Schwartz rejected the offer.

"I never saw an application from him," Schwartz told the Los Angeles Times. "I got a call asking me about the submission for best song and whether Kenny should be included as one of the writers for the song. We checked the rules."

recalled. "But we started getting information that Stephen Schwartz was not reachable and he wouldn't return any of the calls."

At that point, he asked DreamWorks co-partner Jeffrey Katzenberg to find out what was going on.

Sources told The Times that Katzenberg asked the film's producers to persuade Schwartz to include Babyface in the application, but Schwartz flatly refused the request. Katzenberg and DreamWorks realized there was nothing they could do.

Schwartz contends that Babyface is simply not eligible for the Oscar because the award should go to the song that is in the body of the film itself, not a pop version that runs over the end credits.

"Generally, I believe that the song that is nominated is the song that appears in the movie and not the pop version at the end of the soundtrack," Schwartz said in a phone interview this week.

When he and Alan Menken shared an Oscar for best song - "Colors of the Wind" from Pocahontas - Schwartz said he had no idea if academy voters were voting for the song sung by Irene Bedard in the film or the hit record by Vanessa Williams that is also on the soundtrack.

Schwartz also contends that academy rules make Babyface ineligible for an Oscar nomination because he is only a partial contributor to the overall song.

"Someone who comes in and interpolates a piece of the song is not eligible," Schwartz said.

Bruce Davis said academy bylaws specifically state that only principal composers who are "responsible for the conception and execution of the work as a whole shall be eligible for an award."

(Los Angeles Times)

Edmonds said he didn't want to speak out about the controversy until friends expressed outrage that the academy would have Houston and Carey perform his version of the song at the Oscars, even though he was not eligible to win.

"I wouldn't want to take that chance away from them," he said, "but I don't think it's right for them to do my version of the song because I am not eligible."

Believe."

"He was clearly the catalyst for the two singers to come together because of his unique relationship with both of them," Lopez said.

"To have the (academy's) rules dictate that that song cannot be considered for academy consideration is unfathomable."

WHEN the Oscar nominations were announced earlier this

It was clear he was not eligible and that was the end of it. I never had a direct conversation with Kenny on any of it."

Edmonds said he hadn't thought about entering the Oscars until he was prodded by the record company and friends.

"The next thing that was supposed to happen was that Stephen Schwartz was supposed to sign (the application)," Edmonds

DANCE REVIEW

By DAVID BRINN

THE Bolshoi Ballet is long past its prime, but its lingering reputation still draws capacity crowds. Considering that perhaps one shouldn't be surprised that the young students (nine to 17) of the Bolshoi Academy were the main course of the evening.

Yes, there are talented children in Russia; of those who performed, some show promise

Bolshoi Academy of Dance and Bolshoi Soloists
Mina Auditorium

and some lucky few show obvious talent. Still, the academy's performance was disappointing.

Nowadays, we take for granted that one can find good classical ballet training for young dancers everywhere. The Bolshoi Academy's performance lags far behind similar public evenings with the young students of the Kirov

Ballet school and certainly the Paris Opera's. Since it was impossible for the young ones to "sell" proper classical repertoire, the better part of the program included several diversifications of folkloric nature which they performed charmingly, and the Ukrainian dance, the Hungarian dance, the Tarentella etc.

But of course, one doesn't go to an evening of ballet to see the next generation of Monseigneur's dancers. When they challenged the favorite four-cygnets segment from Swan Lake, their union dance was perfectly regimented but looked more like a drill than a dance that is conceived as a pearl of perfection.

Today's shekel

In brief

Forex indexed savings up slightly in '98

The public's foreign-currency indexed financial instruments rose last year from 10.8 percent to 12.7% of an average financial assets portfolio, the Bank of Israel reported yesterday. The remaining components were 25% in unindexed instruments, 46.2% in inflation indexed instruments, and 16.1% in stocks. Overall assets rose just over 13%, while last year's inflation rate reached 8.6%, totaling NIS 827.18 billion as opposed to the previous year's NIS 731b.

Bank of Israel completes transition to euro

The transition of Bank of Israel activities to the new European currency, the euro, was smooth, Bank of Israel Foreign Currency Department head Sylvia Piterman told Europe in Israel, the newsletter of the European Commission to Israel delegation. She added that the central bank faced some difficulties at the beginning primarily with the European payment system, but they were settled satisfactorily.

Canada, Israel seek trade-pact expansion

Canada's International Trade Minister Sergio Marchi and Industry and Trade Minister Natan Shuransky last week agreed to launch talks on the expansion of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, both parties said. Marchi completed a regional tour which included Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and the Palestinian Authority.

Discount Bank completes restructuring plan

Israel Discount Bank started operating yesterday according to a new restructuring plan. Under the new structure, the bank will be divided into four branches: a business division, which will supply services to large and medium-sized companies; a banking division, which will supply retail banking services; a financial division, which will supervise financial activities and risk management; and an operation and information division, which will concentrate all computer activities.

Foxcom Wireless raises $4.25m.

Foxcom Wireless, a developer of fiberoptic communications, raised $4.25 million from a group of investors led by Apax-Leumi, the venture capital fund announced yesterday. Investors in the company include venture capital funds Genesis and Israel Seed Partners. Foxcom Wireless was established last year as a result of a spin-off from affiliate Foxcom, which develops fiberoptic antenna products for the satellite communications, cellular, and wireless markets. The Lod-based company develops fiberoptic based communication solutions serving the wireless industry. The company said that it will use the money to expand its activity as it intends to enter the European and US markets. Apax last year raised $4m. for Foxcom.

Israeli firm buys stake in Greek casino group

Resido P.L.B., an Israeli holding company, announced yesterday that it has acquired, together with a German company, a 60% stake in the new Playboy Casino in Rhodes, Greece, for $22 million. The company, which already operates one casino in Greece, will run the casino together with US-based Playboy. The company said it expects annual revenues of some $70m, and net income of about $23m. The casino is part of a complex which includes a hotel, restaurant, and night club.

Kuwait mulls wage cuts due to oil glut

KUWAIT - The government may have to consider cutting the salaries of civil servants to reduce spending because of weak oil prices, Al-Anba daily reported Saturday. The newspaper quoted a Planning Ministry study as saying allocations for salaries have been growing at about 5% a year. In the fiscal year that ended in June 1998, about 1.28 billion dinars ($4.23 billion) were paid to 132,791 government employees, according to the study.

Oil revenues for that year were 2.55 billion dinars. The decades-old oil-boom policy which guaranteed jobs for all citizens, most in the government, has produced a public sector with too many unproductive employees, the study said.

Still, any effort to reduce the salaries of civil servants would face strong opposition in the National Assembly, whose members believe the government should economize by eliminating corruption and buying fewer weapons.

Kuwait, which depends on oil for more than 90% of its state revenues, is selling crude at about $8 a barrel, down from $17 less than two years ago. It anticipates a budget deficit of more than 2 billion dinars for the current fiscal year.

Nov.-Jan. industrial exports soar 5%

By Jerusalem Post Staff

Industrial exports soared by 5 percent-6% during the period of November-January, after a 2% increase during the previous month and a few negative-growth months prior to that, the Central Bureau of Statistics said yesterday.

The data came along with a host of new statistics which add up to what may ultimately prove to have indicated the beginning of the end of the last three years' economic slowdown.

In December, overall industrial production rose by an annualized 4%-5%; at the same time, the CBS has been detecting a steady increase in factories' raw-material orders and machinery and equipment imports.

In January, raw material imports, excluding fuel, rose 3% after consecutive declines over the previous 10 months. Production in the plastics, chemistry, food, and construction-input industries rose 6%-7% while production in the electricity, electronics, and heavy industries rose 3%-4%.

The number of average weekly work hours accumulated by Israeli, Palestinian, and foreign workers rose 2% during the fourth quarter, after seasonal adjustments.

Revenues in the retail industry rose 4% during December, following 3% and 2% increases during the October-November and July-September periods respectively.

The pace of sales growth in the large retail chains, whose sales total a quarter of their entire industry, reached 8%-9% during the September-January period.

The number of incoming tourists, however, remained static during the December-January period, after rising in each of the previous months beginning in March.

Imports of unpolished diamonds rose during the January-February period by 43% in comparison with the same period last year, though polished diamond exports plunged 11% last month to $284 million, the Trade and Industry Ministry yesterday reported.

Meanwhile, the Treasury reported yesterday that the government posted a NIS 1.247 billion budget deficit in February, excluding credit extension. After subtracting the previous month's budget surplus, the government has so far accumulated a NIS 857 million deficit in fiscal 1999.

The government's activity was financed last month primarily by raising NIS 813 million abroad, NIS 545m. locally, a total of NIS 226m. in asset sales.

Gov't raised NIS 12b. in capital last year

By Jerusalem Post Staff

The government raised a total of NIS 12 billion last year in local and overseas activity, a 7.14 percent increase on the previous year's NIS 11.2b., the Bank of Israel yesterday said.

Of this sum NIS 5.1b. came from asset sales, an additional NIS 4.5b. from local bond sales, and NIS 2.4b. were earned through foreign bond sales.

In all, the government raised more capital than would be necessary to compensate for last year's budget deficit, which ended up at NIS 7.2b., including credit granting.

The central bank indirectly criticized the government for raising more capital than was required for covering the deficit, since issuing bonds - like any lending - comes at a cost, namely debt service, which must be kept to a minimum.

Meanwhile, the central bank reported that Israel's foreign currency reserves declined in February by $469 million to $22.16 billion.

The bank attributed the decline to the government's overseas expenditures and to the dollar's appreciation in global currency markets. A more expensive dollar diminishes Israel's forex reserves balance since those are always quoted in dollar terms.

Against the shekel the dollar depreciated last month 1.36% to NIS 4.047 after peaking earlier in February at NIS 4.0925.

In all, the shekel has gained 2.72% on the dollar since the beginning of the year, as last year's sharp depreciation was stemmed and even reversed, in the aftermath of the Bank of Israel's aggregate 4% increase in interest rates in October.

The shekel at one point in October plunged to an all-time low of NIS 4.354 to the dollar, as some short-term market players fled a host of emerging markets in response to Russia's debt-default announcement.

Frenkel's fifth

Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel (right) and Finance Minister Meir Sheetrit embrace yesterday before their first working session since the latter's appointment last week. Sheetrit is the fifth finance minister (not counting Shimon Peres) who filled the job for three months following Yashov Neeman's resignation) with whom Frenkel will be working since his appointment in 1991 by the late Yitzhak Moda'i. Before entering the meeting, Frenkel said further interest rate cuts may come if inflation continues to decline. The two did not disclose details about the meeting.

Report: Dual listings with NY to expand TASE turnover by 20%

By DAN GERSTENFELD

The approval of the Brodet Committee's recommendations, to allow simultaneous listing on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange of Israeli company shares currently trading on Wall Street only, would lead to an increase of at least 20 percent in the average daily turnover, according to a report published yesterday by the TASE.

Shares of some 70 Israeli companies are currently traded only in the US. The Brodet Committee recommended in September 1998 that measures be taken to ease the requirements for "dual listing" which would allow trading in these shares also on the TASE.

Ronit Harel Ben-Zeev, vice president of the Economic Department at the TASE, said many local investors who currently trade in Israeli shares abroad would prefer to trade on the TASE because of the time difference between Tel Aviv and New York and as commissions on the TASE are lower than on Wall Street.

The TASE, which is very much in favor of dual listing, has already reached the final stages of obtaining recognition as a designated offshore securities market for the US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).

The report shows that the average daily volume in Israeli shares traded in New York amounted last year to $55 million, compared with only $62m. in all of the shares listed on the TASE.

In addition, total turnover in the 21 stocks which are traded both on the TASE and abroad reached 42% of the total trading volume in these shares last year compared with only 28% in 1997.

The main reason for the rise in activity was the decline in trading in New York in the shares of Teva Pharmaceuticals Industries and Niss Systems, which represent some 80% of the trading volume in all dual listed shares.

Trading volume on the TASE in Teva and Niss rose dramatically from 12% in 1997 to 20% and 25% respectively.

According to the report, activity in the majority of shares which are listed both here and abroad continues to concentrate at the TASE.

It is interesting to note, however, that trading in the 21 stocks, which are also listed on Wall Street or London, represents some 20% of total trading on the TASE.

In addition, these companies also represent 19% of the market capitalization of the local bourse.

Trinity confirms £959m. Mirror Group bid

By DANIEL TILLES

LONDON (Bloomberg) - Trinity Plc, the UK's No. 1 regional newspaper publisher, said it wants to acquire Mirror Group Plc, the UK's No. 3 newspaper publisher, in a bid valued at £959 million in cash and stock.

Trinity, which publishes the Liverpool Echo and Crawley

News, said it plans to offer 0.35 share and 40 pence in cash, or 210 pence for each Mirror share. The offer represents an 8.2 percent premium over Mirror's closing share price Friday of 194p.

Trinity broke off merger talks with Mirror, which publishes the Daily Mirror and Sunday Mirror national tabloids, on January 10 over the future role of David Montgomery, Mirror's chief executive.

His resignation two weeks later, however, sparked speculation Trinity would reconsider a bid.

"Discussions with Mirror are continuing," Trinity said.

Trinity shares closed unchanged at 486 pence Friday.

Regional Independent Media, a second regional UK publisher whose £913 million cash bid for Mirror was rejected last month, is also considering an offer for Mirror.

A RIM bid of about £1 billion could also come this week, Sunday Business reported without citing sources.

Sources close to RIM, however, said it's unlikely an offer will be made this week, saying the company will probably wait for government antitrust clearance before making any formal bid.

A bid by either RIM or Trinity would have to be approved by the UK Mergers and Monopolies Commission, which could take three months or longer.

Will the Russian public ever trust the banking system again?

MOSCOW (Reuters) - A lifeless cash machine covered with a grubby plastic sheet and gathering dust in the entrance to a metro station is a fitting symbol of the current state of Russia's bank system.

Six months after Russia was plunged into crisis, a solution to the long-term rebuilding of the bank system and a clear plan on how to reinstall peoples' confidence seems painfully far off.

Analysis criticizes the central bank for moving too slowly and worry that banks are pursuing their own reconstruction plans that may damage creditors' and depositors' interests.

Amid the mess, the prospect of a vibrant and trustworthy bank system that keeps the lifeblood of the economy flowing, guarantees that people can save with little risk and helps credit business, seems as far away as ever.

"I do not personally see a lot of rhyme or reason to the measures that I see being conducted currently," said Margot Jacobs, banking analyst at United Financial Group (UFG).

"They need to commit themselves to closing more banks and more big banks and there needs to be a more transparent strategy for how they are going to do that," she added. The concrete steps the central bank has taken so far include the launch of an agency called ARKO to restructure banks with state help and giving credits to overcome liquidity problems.

It managed to get the payment and settlement system back into motion and backed the transfer of individual deposits from leading troubled banks to state-owned Sberbank.

It also announced it would rank banks in four categories depending on the extent of their problems and ability to survive.

However, little more has been said since the plan was announced and few concrete strategy details outlined.

"Banks are drifting in a nether world and everything good is taken from them," said Kim Isakyan, analyst at MFK Renaissance.

"There is a middle ground in that you don't close everything down now but they have to be a lot firmer. They (the central bank) are so soft you can't feel it," he said.

The central bank, however, is struggling in an environment where it lacks the legal teeth to take tough action as there are no specific regulations governing the bankruptcy of banks.

It lacks qualified personnel to deal with the scale of the crisis and does not have enough of another key commodity - money.

Estimates of how much it will cost to bring the bank system back to life vary from two billion dollars to $20 billion.

"My guess is that with an unscientific sample extrapolated, you have a $10-$20b. problem in terms of clearing it up," said Tom Kelley, a managing partner at accountants Arthur Andersen, adding that this assumed all liabilities were met.

He said given a clear strategy, the right banking rules and international help, the central bank could clear up the mess. He cited the example of the US, where 750 banks were cleaned up over two years in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

The European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD), itself burnt by the bank crisis as equity investments in banks have had to be written off, has said it would support a restructuring plan that was clear and transparent.

But as time slips by, banks are shedding old skins and taking on new ones.

Several top banks are choosing this route.

NEW MARKETS

By PATRICK LANIANN

Retail bank SBS-Agro is metamorphosing into Soyuz (Union) while Rossiyskiy Kredit is to merge with the small Impekbank.

Menatep has shifted some business to its St. Petersburg arm, a legally separate bank, while troubled Uneximbank is to rebuild itself on the basis of a new bank, Rosbank.

The banks have said they are not trying to escape creditors by these moves but analysts expressed worries.

"The risk for creditors is growing because new banks are being formed alongside the old banks," said bank analyst Andrei Ivanov.

Hunting for Italy's biggest prize

BIG DEAL

By YAROSLAV TROFIMOV

Every July, Roberto Colaninno travels across the world to shoot ducks, geese, hares and tern in the Patagonia region of southern Argentina. Now, Olivetti SpA's chief executive is stalking bigger prey right at home.

Colaninno is pursuing Europe's biggest takeover, a hostile, $58 billion bid for Italy's largest company, Telecom Italia SpA.

By stalking Telecom Italia, which is worth seven times as much as Olivetti, the 55-year-old put his own future on the line, as well as those of both companies' investors said.

To help finance the bid, Olivetti is selling $7.4 billion in new stock and convertible bonds - roughly equal to its current market value. The biggest single shareholder, Bell SA, is borrowing money to maintain its 15 percent stake. While Bell's shareholders are close to Colaninno, they wouldn't forgive him if this expense isn't justified, investors said.

"Colaninno is taking on a big risk," said Paolo Rizzo, who manages about 440 million euros ($483 million) in Italian shares at Credit Agricole-Indosuez in Milan. "If the takeover fails, he may well stop being CEO."

That risk was never likely to have deterred him, his friends said. Colaninno, a former tax accountant with a reputation for turning around unprofitable companies, declined to be interviewed for this article.

"Colaninno likes a challenge," said Franco De Benedetti, Olivetti's former chief executive officer who is now a member of Italy's Senate.

"He's a doggedly determined person who makes himself respected by completing whatever mission he sets out to do."

At Olivetti, which he has run since 1996, Colaninno boosted the stock price eight-fold by selling unprofitable personal-computer and computer-services businesses to focus on cellular telecommunications. He turned the company's mobile-phone network into Europe's second-largest - after Telecom Italia Mobile SpA, a unit of Telecom Italia.

At the same time, Colaninno asserted his independence from Olivetti's former chairman and one-time largest shareholder, Carlo De Benedetti, who had named him CEO. De Benedetti, Franco's younger brother, eventually sold his stake in the company.

A FEW months before bidding for Telecom Italia, Colaninno, a father of two, gathered a group of investors from regions around his home town of Mantua, in the foggy flatlands east of Milan, to buy Olivetti shares.

The Bell group, in which a company led by Colaninno is the biggest investor, includes some of his Argentina-bound hunting buddies. Bell, which is registered in Luxembourg for tax reasons, is by far Olivetti's largest shareholder, giving the CEO enough freedom for daring moves such as Telecom Italia bid.

Once Colaninno sets his mind to do something, he can pursue it doggedly. After graduating from the University of Parma three decades ago, for example, he applied to work at the biggest bank in his home town of Mantua, Banca Agricola Mantovana. He didn't get that job, but 20 years later, in 1986, he did get a position at the bank - as a member of the board.

In the intervening years, he worked as a tax accountant and later as the chief accountant at Fiamm Filter, a maker of oil and air filters for cars. He became Fiamm's CEO in 1971, negotiating the company's sale to Turner & Newall Plc of the UK.

When the British investors pulled out in 1981, Colaninno found a new buyer - Carlo De Benedetti.

De Benedetti was a former Fiat SpA executive on his way to becoming one of the most audacious European corporate raiders of the 1980s. He already controlled the pasta maker Buitoni SA and the machinery company Sasib SpA - and, since 1978, Olivetti SpA.

De Benedetti, who declined to be interviewed for this story, added Fiamm to his other auto-parts businesses within Sogefi SpA and named Colaninno chief executive. Under him, Sogefi grew from 15 billion lire ($8.5 million at current exchange rates) in sales and 150 workers in 1981 to 935 billion lire and 4,500 workers in 30 factories in 11 countries in 1997.

Through acquisitions and joint ventures with companies such as Krupp AG of Germany and Arvin Industries Inc. of the US, he built Europe's second-largest maker of automotive filters and its third-largest maker of suspension parts.

Meanwhile, De Benedetti was transforming Olivetti from a maker of typewriters and office furniture into Europe's No. 1 personal-computer manufacturer. By the mid-1980s, its stylish computers captured 20% of the market.

In the late '80s, the fortunes of Sogefi and Olivetti parted - while Sogefi continued to grow, Olivetti began to slide.

With De Benedetti distracted by new financial adventures - in 1988 a hostile bid for Societe Generale de Belgique was defeated after a six-month battle, and from 1988 to 1990 he fought other businessmen for control of the publisher Mondadori Editore SpA - he missed the move toward cheaper "commodity" PCs.

IN 1991, Olivetti lost money for the first time in 13 years, and wouldn't make money again until 1997. Before it returned to profit, cumulative losses reached 2.5 trillion lire and the board forced De Benedetti to resign as chairman and chief executive.

When he left in 1996, De Benedetti appointed a 38-year-old protégé, Francesco Caio, to run the company. Caio, however, lasted only 70 days before resigning over interference by his mentor. De Benedetti then tapped Colaninno as the new CEO.

At the time, many Italian newspapers dismissed Colaninno as a provincial manager and a De Benedetti stooge, but he soon imposed his own mark on the company.

While De Benedetti had picked telecommunications as a growth business, and in 1994 had bid for and won the license to set up a cell-phone company to compete with Telecom Italia, Colaninno accelerated the move.

For De Benedetti and most Olivetti managers, mobile phones were an adjunct to the computer operations. Colaninno, having already switched from auto parts to computers, preferred a clean break with the past.

Within a year of taking control of Olivetti, he concluded that Italy couldn't compete with low-cost Asian countries in assembling personal computers and sold the PC business to private investors. A year later, he sold Olivetti's computer service and software unit to Wang Laboratories Inc.

That let him focus his attention and Olivetti's resources on Omnitel Pronto Italia SpA, the cell-phone business, and it paid off. Omnitel has signed up 6.5 million customers, more than the mobile-phone units at France Telecom SA, Deutsche Telekom AG and British Telecommunications Plc.

Omnitel's aggressive sales effort has helped make Italy the biggest mobile phone market in Europe, with 22 million customers.

Colaninno raised money to build Omnitel by selling a 49.9% stake in Olivetti's telecommunications businesses to Mannesmann AG of Germany for 2.4 billion deutsche marks ($1.3 billion) in 1997.

The businesses, owned by an Olivetti company called Oliman NV, include Infostrada SpA, which competes with Telecom Italia on conventional fixed-line telephone service.

Mannesmann, which also helped Olivetti underwrite a share sale last year, now says it is ready to buy the rest of Oliman for 14.9 billion marks, to ease antitrust regulators' concerns about Olivetti's bid for Telecom Italia.

"Colaninno may be thinking he has extracted as much value as possible from Omnitel-Infostrada, while Telecom Italia, with its inefficiencies, still presents big opportunities for improvement and creating new value," said Patrizio Pazzaglia, who manages $90 million at Nusa SLM in Rome.

If he succeeds in bagging Italy's biggest company, Colaninno will wind up with a trophy bigger than anything to be found in Patagonia. (Bloomberg)

THE CONFERENCE CIRCUIT

By GREER FAY CASHMAN

7.3 Everything in Israel has political ramifications, so it's hardly surprising that the Radisson Moriah Global Lady Executive Club is hosting an evening of economics spiced with politics under the title of "The connection between prime and politics." The event at the Radisson Moriah, Tel Aviv will feature personalities such as Communications Minister Limor Livnat, MKs Yael Dayan and Anat Maor, Knesset hopeful Nohama Ronen and executive ladies not quite as well known to the public such as Sarita Lahavi, general manager of Hanot Discount, Leah Ahar, general manager of Compro Systems and Ronit Silon who chairs the forum of female industrial managers. For further details call Bank Colodro 03-5198805/6.

7.3 Wars, Revolutions and Generational Identity is the title of a two-day international conference to be hosted by the Yitzhak Rabin Center for Israel Studies at Tel Aviv University. The conference will commemorate the 77th birthday of the late prime minister who was assassinated in November 1995 at the conclusion of a peace rally. The conference taking place at the Ettinger Hall in the Gilman Building on the Tel Aviv campus begins with the impact of World War I, and continues to World War II, the Vietnam generation, revolutions in the Arab world, generational changes amongst Palestinians, the generation of the first Israelis, immigrants, changes in religious Zionism and the "Rabin Children" as a metaphor for a new generational identity.

9.3 Every boss wants to get the most out of his employees, and the two-day seminar at the Dan Panorama Tel Aviv on Strategic Management of Human Resources is geared towards that aim. Some 60 speakers from Israel and abroad will present individual papers and participate in panel discussions on topics such as: the human resources manager as a strategic partner; the place of institutions of higher education in the development of human resources for the next decade; coaching, mentoring and information management; the human resources manager as an internal consultant in the organization; developments and innovations in testing ability in Israel and abroad; the war for talent; contract labor; employee retention; managing human resources in small companies; unemployment - facing realities; EAP - employee assistance programs; coping with different wage systems; thinking towards the future. For further details and registration, contact the Israel Management Center 03-6957202.

9.3 With shopping on the Internet becoming a way of life, retailers are getting more than a little anxious about their future prospects. To shed some light on the subject, Shenkar College is sponsoring a study day on Retail in the Third Millennium - Revolution or More of the Same, at Gan Oranim in Tel Aviv. Topics tabled for discussion include: strategic directions in the retailing field in Israel; supermarket chains in Israel - which direction?; transformation of distribution by suppliers to distribution by supermarket chains; entrance of international groups to local supermarket chains; power centers as an alternative to small centers; the supermarket of the year 2000; and customer preferences based on marketing research results. The study day will wind up with a panel discussion on alternative retail systems. The speakers are all senior executives with major retail operations.

17.3 The Tel Aviv Hilton is the venue for the MBA Fair at which admission officers of American, European and Australian Master of Business Administration programs will meet with Israeli candidates interested in receiving the degree which today is a passport to executive status in the world of business. With over 1,250 different MBA degrees being offered around the world, it is not easy for candidates to choose the right one. The goal of the Tel Aviv MBA Fair is to provide candidates with maximum data so as to enable them to make informed choices. The Fair which takes place between 3 - 8 p.m. is basically an introduction. Special interview sessions will be organized for the day after the fair. Interviews will be by appointment only and can be reserved by e-mail at mbaevents@infonine.fr or via fax to: MBA Events Paris 33-1-45-561571.

17.3 The English Speaking Friends of Tel Aviv University in conjunction with Tel Aviv's Department of the Arts is presenting an eight-session, spring seminar beginning with a lecture discussion led by Shmuelik Dovdevani on hedonistic paradigm in Israeli cinema. Subjects to be discussed in future sessions include: TV in Israel; land and climate in Israeli cinema; nostalgic and collective identity in Israeli cinema; films & TV - TV dramas/documentaries; representation of the Jew in American cinema; TV in Israel in the global era: The disappearance of Yiddish culture - Laura Adler and what happened. For further details and registration contact Anat Halevy 03-640 9487; 03-640 6371.

3rd time doesn't look like a charm for Maccabi

Tel Aviv faces Kinder Bologna
in Game 1 of Final 16
EuroLeague series tonight in Italy

By BRIAN FREEMAN

Maccabi Tel Aviv returns to the EuroLeague Final 16 tonight for the third straight season but with less chance than ever of emerging victorious.

Not only is Maccabi facing the defending European champions Kinder Bologna in the best-of-three series, but is once again without the home-court advantage.

Maccabi has lost all nine encounters in Bologna during championship play – including last season when Tel Aviv lost both games of the Final 16 series there to Kinder's rival Teamsystem.

The loss to Teamsystem came despite the fact that Maccabi entered the series with high hopes, having captured seven European games in a row for its longest winning streak this decade.

But even while playing its best basketball of the season and bringing an unprecedented five-game road winning streak into the series, Tel Aviv could not overcome the Italians on their home court.

The same was true two seasons ago when Maccabi fell in three games – two of them in Istanbul – to Efes Pilsen, despite coming into that series with a clean bill of health after being plagued by injuries throughout the final pool.

This season Maccabi can hardly boast of any type of momentum as it gets set to start the series. It has stumbled to a 7-9 record and won only one out of eight road games – and that against last-place Red Star Belgrade.

Tel Aviv has often looked impressive at home, routing its opponents by an average margin of 24 points in winning six European contests in a row at Yad Eliahu. But a championship-caliber club also has to perform on the road, and Maccabi has been unable to come through in the clutch in numerous close contests.

Bologna, on the other hand, enters the series returning much the same team which brought the city its first EuroLeague title last season and is determined to become the first team since Split captured its third title in a row in 1991 to win consecutive European championships.

Even with superstar Predrag Danilovic injured for much of the season and Bologna without a second foreigner (after Zarko Paspalj was released and his replacement, No. 1 draft pick Michael Olowokandi, went to the NBA when the lockout ended), the team still finished 10-6 in final pool play while facing tougher overall opponents than Maccabi.

Tel Aviv has another huge obstacle to overcome in that Maccabi finds it particularly difficult to upset quality defensive teams – and Kinder has the best defense in the EuroLeague, allowing 60.9 points a game, more than 10 points less per contest than Maccabi's 72.5.

The team's stifling defense helps make up for a lack of offensive firepower without Danilovic, who has not played due to injury since January 10 after his Player of the Year season last year. Danilovic returned to the court for the first time for an exhibition game last Friday, but it is uncertain at what strength he will be at against Maccabi.

French point guard Antoine Rigaudau is a quality defender and scorer – including from three-

Slovenian center Radoslav Nesterovic, 23, doubled his scoring average from last season and is a great presence in clogging up the lane. But for such a big man (2.14 meters) and a No. 1 draft pick in the NBA, he only takes 8.7 shots and pulls down 6.1 rebounds per game (Victor Alexander, for example, averages nearly 13 shy attempts and 9 rebounds a contest.

The only other Bologna player to average double figures in scoring is guard Alessandro Abbio, but his most important contribution to the club is his defensive prowess – which in the series will most likely be utilized against Oded Katash. Abbio is also recovering from injury, and it remains to be seen how this will impact upon his performance.

In fact, Bologna's bench is also better known for its aggressive defense than for lighting up the basket.

Although he usually starts, Alessandro Frosini plays less than 22 minutes a game, but still averages 2.2 steals. In addition, Hugo Scarnicchi is sent in specifically to shut down a hot hand, while Claudio Crippa and Augusto Binelli provide crucial minutes and valuable experience.

For Maccabi, it seems like the club has been waiting the entire season for the right chemistry to click in – with the swapping of foreign players, the season-ending injury to Borko Radovic, the replacement of head coach Yoram Harush with Pini Gershon and the return of Katash several games into the EuroLeague.

There would be no better time for all the disparate parts to come together, but that is more wishful thinking than based on any trend that can be seen in Maccabi's play.

Tonight's game in Bologna is scheduled to be shown live starting at 9:30 p.m. Game 2 will be at Yad Eliahu on Thursday, and Game 3, if necessary will be back in Bologna the following Thursday.

Astros aren't ready to give up title hopes

The Houston Astros lost Moises Alou to a knee injury and lost out in the Roger Clemens derby, but general manager Jerry Hunsicker isn't ready to concede his club's position as the decided favorite in the National League Central.

"We're not going to cover up the fact that it was a huge blow to the ballclub to lose Moises," Hunsicker said recently, "but we want to make sure the team isn't feeling sorry for themselves. We recognize that we have a talented ballclub. Not only are we still capable of winning the division, I still expect to win the division."

The Astros still appear to be the most talented team in the division, but the inability to replace free agent Randy Johnson and the injury to Alou undoubtedly have narrowed the ability gap with the other division contenders.

Give Manager Larry Dierker credit for finding a silver lining. He's just happy that the Astros still have enough depth to populate the outfield with three quality players – Derek Bell, Carl Everett and promising Richard Hidalgo – and the potential to offset the offensive subtraction with a solid performance from reclaimed free-agent third baseman Ken Caminiti.

"It's not as big a loss as if we were going to lose (Jeff) Bagwell or (Craig) Biggio because we've got three everyday outfielders that have fielding ability, strong throwing arms and can do some damage with the bats," said Dierker. "We don't have anybody backing up at second base or first base who can do what Bagwell and Biggio can do. Nobody's going to replace Alou, but we've got people who can come close."

The Astros won 102 games on the way to their second straight NL Central title last year, but they needed a 10-1 performance by Johnson down the stretch to run away from the rest of the division.

They had hoped to replace Johnson with Clemens, but now figure to enter the season with 19-game winner Shane Reynolds reclaiming his former role as the club's No. 1 starter.

The Astros' front office should be thankful for one other thing: The Chicago Cubs did almost nothing during the off-season to alter the balance of power in the NL Central after finishing close behind Houston last year.

The Cubs made a few marginal moves, signing free-agent catcher Benito Santiago and starting pitcher Jon Lieber, but did not add an impact player to last year's wild-card playoff entry. The club obviously is hoping for a big year from phenom Kerry Wood and another MVP performance by Sammy Sosa to stay in the playoff picture.

Talk about passive resistance. If the Cubs caught a break when Alou went down, they are in danger of being caught from behind by the Cincinnati Reds or the St. Louis Cardinals, both of which took a much more proactive approach during the winter.

The Reds, with their acquisition of former 20-game winner Denny Neagle and 50-home run hitter Greg Vaughn, have re-established themselves as a legitimate playoff contender and are hoping to strike a blow for baseball's economic also-rans. The Cardinals also made a number of off-season moves, but still must wait to see if they are a better club than the one that won 83 games in the shadow of Mark McGwire's record-breaking 70-homer performance last year.

The Cardinals lost outfielder Brian Jordan to free agency and traded Ron Gant to the Phillies to beef up their bullpen, but are banking on big performances from free agents Eric Davis and Carlos Baerga to keep them in contention.

The trouble is, it's highly likely that the only team to reach the postseason from the NL Central next year will be the division champion, since the Mets have upgraded in the East and there are several quality teams in the West.

McGwire confident
McGwire said that he feels confident that the Cardinals have gotten better over the winter.

"The off-season moves were very good," McGwire said. "I like what we did up the middle. We got Eric Davis. Our pitching staff is improved. Our bullpen is strong. I don't think there is a front-runner." Of course, that wasn't the case a couple of weeks ago, when Alou was healthy and the Astros were still pondering the blockbuster deal for Clemens.

"I know everybody gave a sigh of relief when Roger was traded to the Yankees," McGwire said.

He could have been speaking for everyone in the division. McGwire, looking for a break from last year's sensory overload, traveled all the way to Australia over the off-season in hopes of finding a place where he wouldn't be recognized on the street. He almost succeeded.

"I ran into a lot of American tour groups," he said. "That was the only drawback. I thought I had found a place where nobody knows me." No such luck, but McGwire said that he was treated politely by fans wherever he went after last year's historic home run chase.

"People have been great," he said. (The Baltimore Sun)

UConn wins Big East title for 5th time in last 6 years

NEW HAVEN (AP) – Richard Hamilton gave Connecticut another Big East title and the Huskies also handed Syracuse a little payback in the process.

Hamilton scored 26 points as No. 4 UConn claimed its fifth regular-season conference title in the last six years with a 70-58 victory over the No. 24 Orangemen on Sunday.

Syracuse beat the Huskies 59-42 earlier this season for UConn's first loss. The Huskies (25-2, 16-2 Big East) played that game without Hamilton and Jake Voskuhl because of injuries.

"We definitely had something to prove, especially without those guys (in the first game) and because they beat us," said Khalid El-Amin, who added 21 for the Huskies.

"We wanted to come out and show we're really the best team in the Big East."

UConn, which fell behind by 10 points in the first half, took control in the second.

Syracuse (19-10, 10-8) did not score a basket for a span of 8:30, including the final 3:13 of the first half, as Connecticut rallied from an eight-point deficit with an impressive 23-3 run.

Ryan Blackwell had 20 points and Jason Hart added 11 for Syracuse, which shot just 25.8 percent in the second half, while the Huskies hit 69.6% thanks to 10 fast-break layups or dunks.

"Khalid hurt us the most, particularly starting out the second half in transition," Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim said.

"We did not do a good job in transition. We just did not get back well. They went with a smaller team."

Michigan State 60

No. 23 Purdue 46

At West Lafayette, Indiana, Morris Peterson led Michigan State

(26-4, 15-1) to its school-record 15th straight Big Ten victory. The Spartans previously clinched the regular-season conference crown.

Purdue (19-11, 7-9) saw its hopes for a seventh consecutive NCAA appearance diminish.

The Boilermakers would need four victories in the Big Ten tournament to get the conference's automatic bid.

Tennessee 68.

No. 13 Kentucky 61

At Knoxville, Tennessee, Tony Harris scored 18 points as the Volunteers (20-7, 12-4) upset Kentucky to sweep the Wildcats for the first time in two decades and capture the Southeastern Conference East Division crown.

Kentucky (22-8, 11-5) closed with a fourth consecutive road loss and was led by Scott Padgett's and Michael Bradley's 10 points.

No. 17 Coll. of Charleston 77

Appalachian State 67

At Greensboro, North Carolina, Danny Johnson scored 21 points, including a clutch 3-pointer down the stretch, as the Cougars rallied to beat Appalachian State in the Southern Conference championship game.

The victory was the 25th in a row for the Cougars (28-2), who earned an automatic berth to the NCAA tournament with the win.

Massachusetts 57

No. 24 Temple 49

At Amherst, Massachusetts, Monty Mack hit five 3-pointers and finished with 18 points as the Minutemen (13-15, 9-7 Atlantic-10) held the Owls to just two baskets for nearly the entire second half.

Lamont Barnes had 14 points and eight rebounds to pace the Owls (19-9, 13-3), who lost for the third time in 16 games.

Atherton recalled to 1-day squad for World Cup

LONDON – Mike Atherton was recalled to the England one-day squad yesterday for the World Cup opening at Lord's on May 14 in a team heavy on experience but light on flair.

Atherton, who has an impressive one-day record in England, has not represented his country in the one-day arena for two years and endured a torrid time against Glenn McGrath in the recent Ashes series.

The former England skipper also suffers from a long-standing back problem and, along with Graham Thorpe and Ian Austin, faces a fitness test before May 2.

Surrey left-hander Thorpe, England's most reliable batsman in any form of cricket, flew home early from the Australian tour with a back injury while Austin has undergone a knee operation.

"Michael Atherton's record in this country is outstanding," England chairman of selectors David Graveney told a news conference at Lord's.

"And Graham Thorpe has been missed in the middle order in both one-day and Test cricket."

The generously-built Austin, a reliable all-rounder with Lancashire but at 32 hardly a bright young prospect for the new millennium, is one of five all-rounders included in the final squad of 15.

Vince Wells, 33, is rewarded for some gritty performances during England's disappointing one-day series in Australia and Adam Hoolioake, who has lost his spot as England's one-day captain, has clung on to his place.

Mark Ealham, whose limitations at Test level were again exposed in Australia, has also won selection, with the selectors opting for Robert Croft as the only specialist spinner.

In one concession to youth, 21-year-old Andrew Flintoff has

MD: Headers may cause brain damage

LONDON (AP) – A British doctor has called for a ban on heading the ball in all areas of the field except the penalty box to protect soccer players from possible brain damage.

David Kernick, a medical officer with Division Three club Exeter City, says evidence is mounting that heading the ball repeatedly can cause "mental decline," the British Journal of General Practice reported yesterday.

Kernick said it would be impossible to ban heading outright because it is an essential part of the game and "offers an important dimension of play, particularly around the goalmouth." But he said in view of the "millions of players throughout the world, if heading the ball caused even a slight amount of brain damage there would be significant health consequences."

Pippen, Rodman face off as Lakers beat Rockets

INGLEWOOD, California (Reuters) - Michael Jordan was in the house to watch former Bulls teammates Scottie Pippen and Dennis Rodman play each other, but it was Rick Fox who stole the show on Sunday.

Fox shot a perfect 7-for-7 from the field, scoring 15 of his 21 points with four 3-pointers in the fourth quarter, to lead the Los Angeles Lakers to a 106-90 victory over the Houston Rockets.

With his torrid shooting, Fox upstaged the former Bulls as well as All-Stars Shaquille O'Neal and Kobe Bryant of the Lakers and Hakeem Olajuwon and Charles Barkley of the Rockets.

"The shots and the openings were there," Fox said. "I think with the fact that I wasn't in the game in the first half, nobody really paid any attention to me. That allowed me to get open and to shoot the ball the way that I did." O'Neal led the Lakers with 22 points and Bryant added 18, but Fox sparked the team in the final quarter when the Lakers pulled away, outscoring Houston 29-18.

"Rick played an unbelievable game," O'Neal said.

Rodman grabbed 10 rebounds and scored his first two points as a Laker in 26 minutes off the bench. Pippen, Jordan's sidekick for six championships in Chicago, had 16 points, six rebounds and eight assists for Houston.

Heat 84, Magic 78

The host Heat used stifling defense to hold Orlando to 11 points in the second and fourth quarters and pull out a win over the Magic, their eighth in nine games.

Alonzo Mourning led the Heat with 24 points, countering miserable 5-for-20 shooting by making 14-of-15 free throws.

Terry Porter, starting in place of injured All-Star guard Tim Hardaway, chipped in 17 for Miami, which moved within a half game of Orlando for first place in the Atlantic Division.

Nick Anderson had 25 points to pace the Magic, who led by as many as 20 points early in the second quarter.

Pistons 89, Knicks 68

Joe Dumars scored eight of his 21 points in a decisive 14-0 third-quarter run as the host Pistons crushed New York.

Lindsey Hunter had 16 points and Jerry Stackhouse added 13 off the bench for the Pistons, who scored more points in the third quarter (28) than the Knicks in the entire second half.

Allan Houston had 13 points to lead the Knicks, who scored 27 points on 10-of-34 shooting after intermission and shot just 36 percent overall.

Jazz 101, Spurs 87

Karl Malone scored 30 points

WORMING IN - LA's Dennis Rodman goes up for a rebound against Houston's Hakeem Olajuwon. Rodman had 10 rebounds in the Lakers' 106-90 win.

and Jeff Hornacek added 18 as the visiting Jazz improved to a league-best 11-2.

The Jazz were in control throughout, leading 79-62 after three quarters and by as many as 24 points in the fourth.

Bulls 90, Raptors 88

Randy Brown hit a 21-footer at the overtime buzzer to lift visiting Chicago to victory as the Bulls recovered from a fourth-quarter collapse.

The Bulls appeared headed for an easy win when a 15-0 third-quarter run gave them a commanding 68-51 lead.

Chicago fell apart in the fourth quarter, getting outscored by 23-9 by Toronto as Dee Brown hit a 3-pointer with 31 seconds remaining in regulation to force overtime.

Suns 102, Warriors 89

Golden State tied an NBA mark for fourth-quarter futility, scoring just six points in the final 12 minutes, as the host Suns rallied.

In the final period, the Warriors shot 2-of-21 from the field, including 0-of-10 from 3-point range, as the Suns outscored them 26-6.

Clifford Robinson and Tom Gugliotta scored 20 points each and Jason Kidd added 17 for Phoenix.

76ers 87, Bucks 76

Allen Iverson scored 25 points and dished out seven assists to lead visiting Philadelphia to victory for their fourth straight win.

Ray Allen scored 16 points and Glenn Robinson added 14 for the Bucks, who have lost four of their last five.

Trail Blazers 100, Timberwolves 93

Rasheed Wallace scored 22 points and sank a 3-pointer in the middle of a decisive 9-0 fourth-quarter run as the visiting Trail Blazers posted their seventh win in eight games.

Nuggets 116, Grizzlies 112

Antonio McDyess poured in a career-high 46 points and Chauncey Billups hit two clutch 3-pointers in the final 50 seconds as the host Nuggets won, despite blowing a 16-point fourth-quarter lead.

Cullinan 'embarrassed' after breaking record

AUCKLAND (AP) - Daryll Cullinan said he felt embarrassed after breaking Graeme Pollock's South African run scoring record with 275 not out in the first Test against New Zealand.

After Cullinan's innings had inspired South Africa to 621 for five declared, Matthew Horne led a spirited fightback, hitting an unbeaten 92 in New Zealand's 205 for two at stumps on the third day at Eden Park.

"I feel embarrassed," Cullinan said of passing Pollock's 274 against Australia in Durban in 1969-70.

"He was our batting icon and a genius of a batsman. Although I am proud of my achievement it hasn't sunk in yet that I have replaced him at the top of the ladder."

Cullinan resumed yesterday on 246 and passed Jackie McGlew's 255 not out against New Zealand in Wellington in 1952-53 before chasing Pollock's record.

Pollock's nephew Shaun Pollock was the first to congratulate Cullinan as they shared 126 runs for the sixth wicket.

After being sent into bat, South Africa ground out the New Zealand attack for 13 hours and 13 minutes and finished a run short of the record 622 for nine posted by Ali Bacher's side against Australia at Kingsmead in 1969-70.

Cullinan provided the backbone of the South African batting as he shared three record stands with Gary Kirsten (128), Jonty Rhodes (63) and Pollock (69 not out).

Cullinan's epic innings lasted 659 minutes and was the longest by a South African batsman, surpassing Kirsten's 650 minutes for 210 against England at Old Trafford in July 1998.

The South African No. 4 walked off to a guard of honor formed by his teammates.

It has been a fairytale return to the South African side for Cullinan, since being axed twice in the space of five matches in early 1998.

He marked his return with a century against Sri Lanka at Cape Town in March 1998, and since has scored 1124 runs in 15 Tests averaging 56.20 with four centuries and six fifties.

Maggert wins Match Play championship

CARLSBAD, California (Reuters) - Jeff Maggert ended a more than five-year title drought in dramatic fashion on Sunday by winning the Match Play Championship and its $1 million grand prize in sudden death.

Maggert holed a 20-foot chip shot for birdie on the second extra hole at La Costa - the par-3 11th - to claim victory after he and Andrew Magee had finished 36 holes all square.

"Gosh what a week! It's been a long time, five-and-a-half years since I've been in the winner's circle, and what a tournament to get back in it," said Maggert, who was seeded 24th in a stellar international field of 64 that began the event on Wednesday.

"I'm thrilled to death," added the 35-year-old Maggert, who won his first title at the 1993 Walt Disney World Classic and had not won since.

Magee, who was seeded 50th, was rewarded handsomely for losing, earning $500,000 as runner-up. Maggert got off to a quick start early Sunday morning by winning the first two holes of what was supposed to be a 36-hole final but took 38 to complete.

Magee woke up in time to win five of the next six holes and seize a 3 up lead.

It remained that way until Maggert won the 13th and 14th holes. But Magee took the 15th to re-establish a 2 up advantage at the break after 18 holes.

Magee birdied the 20th hole to again go ahead 3 up, but Maggert responded by winning the next three holes with two birdies and a par.

The golf got a little sloppy after that in the nip and tuck final. Magee won the 24th with a par, then halved the next - the par-3 seventh - with a bogey after pulling his tee shot into the pond.

Maggert won the 28th hole with a birdie to pull all square again, but Magee nosed back in front with a birdie of his own at the 30th.

Maggert immediately erased the deficit by winning the 31st hole with a birdie. They halved the next four holes to come to the last locked all square after each had won nine holes.

Maggert, who has 13 second-place finishes on the PGA Tour, had a chance to win at the 36th hole, but he just missed a nine-foot birdie putt as the ball rolled past the edge of the cup and the contest went into extra holes.

He made amends for the near miss on the final regulation hole two holes later with his beautiful chip from the fringe dead center into the cup.
